VOLUME X, PART II.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FORTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

I will not pursue the argument of the Supreme Court any further in that immediate connection, because I think that part of the subject is sufficiently elucidated. Without reading the connecting part of the opinion, which would make it very much more clear, I will content myself with reading from page 224 of 15 Curtis, as follows:

Whenever the United States shall have fully executed these trusts, the municipal sovereignty of the new States will be complete, throughout their respective borders, and they and the original States will be upon an equal footing, in all respects whatever. We therefore think the United States hold the public lands within the new States by force of the deeds of cession, and the statutes connected with them, and not by any municipal sovereignty which it may be supposed they possess, or have reserved by compact with the new States, for that particular purpose. The provision of the Constitution above referred to, shows that no such power can be exercised by the United States within a State. Such a power is not only repugnant to the Constitution, but it is inconsistent with the spirit and intention of the deeds of cession. The argument, so much relied on by the counsel for the plaintiffs, that the agreement of the people inhabiting the new States, "that they forever disclaim all right and title to the waste or unappropriated lands lying within the said Territory; and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States," cannot operate as a contract between the parties, but is binding as a law.

It cannot operate as a contract between the parties. It has none of the elements of a contract about it. It is called a compact, which needs no consideration for its support as a contract. It is a mere agreement between two governments, depending upon the good faith of the one or the other for its execution, according as each may have the power to execute it, and as either is under an obligation to execute it.

Full power is given to Congress "to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States." This authorized the passage of all laws necessary to secure the rights of the United States to the public lands, and to provide for their sale, and to protect them from taxation.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I would call the Senator's attention to the language employed in the act of Congress admitting the States of Florida and Iowa into the Union.

Mr. MORGAN. I have noticed that.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The act of March 3, 1845, provides—

That in consideration of the concessions made by the State of Florida in respect to the public lands, there be granted to the said State eight entire sections of land for the purpose of fixing their seat of government.

The act also included 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sale of lands within the State which should be sold by Congress, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, provided it should be appropriated to public schools. I make no claim that it is a contract enforceable as contracts usually are; but I say that that stipulation is just as binding upon this Government as a moral person as any contract that could be entered into between two individuals would be binding upon them.

Mr. MORGAN. I will ask the Senator from Florida if the words "in consideration of" were stricken out of that act, it would not be just as imperative and its force just as great as it is with the words in?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Perhaps so.

Mr. MORGAN. Then they do not amount to anything. Those words have no bearing on the question.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Oh, yes; they show that Congress did not wish to leave anything to implication. They were put there for the purpose of showing that in consideration of the abandonment of the right to tax and the other things stipulated here these concessions were to be made. They did not want to leave it in doubt at all. The words would have been implied if they were omitted; but, in order to relieve the case of ambiguity and to leave no cause for implication, the words were put in specifically.

Mr. MORGAN. They have left that just as it was left in the case of any other State, except the expression of the consideration, which the Senator from Florida says is not necessary to the validity of the law or the binding force of the contract. So that throws no new light on the construction of the statute; that does not prove whether the lands were to be actually sold, all of them, or whether the Government had its discretionary power remaining to donate some of them to the citizens of Florida for the building of railways and canals, or for asylums or colleges or public schools, or matters of that kind.

I notice the words in the agreement between Iowa and Florida on the one part and the United States Government on the other, in the act of their admission, being an act for the admission of both States jointly, and I cannot see that the words "in consideration of the release of the power of taxation," or whatever it might have been intended to release, had the slightest effect on the construction of the law, and certainly they had no effect on its validity or its efficacy as a binding compact with the United States.

Now I proceed to read further from this opinion of the Supreme Court:

And all constitutional laws are binding on the people, in the new States and the old ones, whether they consent to be bound by them or not. Every constitutional act of Congress is passed by the will of the people of the United States, expressed through their representatives, on the subject-matter of the enactment, and when so passed, it becomes the supreme law of the land, and operates by its own force on the subject-matter, in whatever State or Territory it may happen to be. The proposition, therefore, that such a law cannot operate upon the subject-matter of its enactment without the express consent of the people of the new State where it may happen to be, contains its own refutation, and requires no further examination. The proposition submitted to the people of the Alabama Territory, for their acceptance or rejection, by the act of Congress authorizing them to form a constitution and State government for themselves, so far as they related to the public lands within that Territory, amounted to nothing more nor less than rules and regulations respecting the sales and disposition of the public lands. The supposed compact relied on by the counsel for the plaintiffs conferred no authority, therefore, on Congress to pass the act granting to the plaintiffs the land in controversy.

Now, we have the full definition by the Supreme Court of the United States of what this compact means so far as it relates to the public lands. They say these compacts are no more and no less than mere rules and regulations enacted by Congress for the disposal of the public lands. That the Government of the United States has morally and equitably satisfied the demands of the people of any State whatever when it has justly disposed of the lands to its people. And when, as in the case of Alabama, the "rules and regulations" which are provided in the original compact have been altered by Congress for the greater facility of immigration and settlement in the State, I do not understand that we have got a right to go into its Treasury and to get out of it money enough to compensate us for all the suppositions advantages which might possibly arise in our imagination, or under our estimation of our rights, to compensate us for possible losses. I do not understand that we have got any solid legal ground of right to stand upon, but that Congress has the right to alter these rules and regulations, being controlled in the exercise of that power by what is right and equitable and moral and just between all the people of this country.

Now, we see the nature of the powers of Congress over this subject as defined by the Supreme Court of the United States, and I think that this elucidation of the subject by this opinion, in which all the judges concurred except one, Judge Catron, of Tennessee—and he did not dissent on this proposition—this elucidation of the law clears up a great many of the difficulties which gentlemen have suggested in the course of the debate on this bill, and we are left now to the consideration of the power of Congress with reference to the disposal of the public lands as a power to be exercised under that clause which gives to us the authority to provide rules and regulations for the disposal of the public lands, and the compact that was entered into with Alabama, it seems, was nothing more nor less than a series of rules and regulations agreed upon at the time by the Government of the United States and since that time very essentially modified in Alabama at the request of the Legislature.

I will therefore leave the subject with this statement of my opinion on the general merits of this bill.

If the Senate should refuse the motion of the Senator from Vermont, and the bill should still remain for the consideration of the Senate, I shall be induced, perhaps, to make some little criticism on the provisions of the bill, which I think in themselves are not just either to the Government or to the people, and certainly may be the means of very great abuse and very great partiality by a Secretary of the Treasury. I cannot understand why the Secretary of the Treasury should have the power to be given him under this bill to pay money to one State and issue 3.65 obligations to another State, as he clearly has the power under this bill to do if it be passed as amended by the committee. I will read that part of the bill:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, at his option, pay the said amounts allowed, or any part thereof, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

And if it is optional, of course he can pay the amount or any part thereof to any State in 3.65 bonds. I do not think, when we are making a provision by which four or five millions of money are to be paid out of the Treasury, that we should leave it entirely to the option of the Secretary of the Treasury whether he will pay some States in bonds or money, and give the States no option as to what they may prefer. However, that is a matter which will come up more properly in the further consideration of this measure, if the motion of the Senator from Vermont to indefinitely postpone, which I hope he will modify as I have indicated, shall not prevail.

I have but one word to add, Mr. President, on this subject and that is that a trust which is created in the original deed of cession by the State of Georgia, the trust created between it and the United States Government, is a trust that contemplated the admission of two States, one originally, and afterward by the amendment of the act of Congress two, out of that Territory lying west of the boundaries of Georgia, and east of the Mississippi River. That was a beautiful, fertile country. None, perhaps, surpassed it on this great continent. It was one of the most inviting countries for immigration that could possibly be found. Slaveholders were going in there in large numbers and occupying the richest lands of the country. As a matter of course the small proprietors in the eastern Southern States were not willing to sell their homes and go West, and the young men who were rising up in society were not willing to take their wives and household goods and march into the wilderness and settle up that country unless they had some encouragement from the Congress of the United States. Among the very first acts of legislation, among the very first resolutions adopted in my State by its Legislature were acts that were intended to invite the people to come from the older States and occupy their lands, but particularly they desired the yeomanry of the country, the hard-working American citizens, white men, to come there and occupy the lands. And so from the time the State was first introduced into the Union down to the commencement of the war, the constant clamor and appeal on the part of the people of the State of Alabama was to Congress that they would reduce the price of the public lands. Congress co-operated with them in granting this desire, and in the carrying out of this joint purpose of Congress and of my State, population was invited there; it increased with great rapidity, and now to-day we have as contented, as happy, as industrious and honest a population as can be found in the world, and I hope and pray that it may be triplicated in the course of the next twenty-five years.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to ask him whether there was anything in the deed of cession from the State of Georgia to the Government of the United States which was inconsistent with that provision in the constitution of Alabama which agreed to the compact: whether, in other words, when the State came to be admitted into the Union as a State, the people of that Territory did not have the right to enter into the compact, so called, with the United States that was made, or was that in the opinion of the Senator inconsistent with the agreement entered into between the Government of the Union and the government of the State of Georgia which ceded the land which now comprises the territory of that State.

Mr. MORGAN. The people of the State of Alabama did not put it in their constitution; they passed an ordinance.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It is the same thing—an organic law.

Mr. MORGAN. I will say it is an organic law, having as much force as if it was in the constitution. I do not understand that that ordinance was unconstitutional as violating the act of cession, provided it is consistent with the proposition that the Congress of the United States retained the absolute right of disposition of the public domain, because the land ceased to be land and became money when the trust attached. That is the reason of it; but if the trust goes back of that proposition, and instead of attaching to the money when realized attaches to the land, and thereby becomes an incumbrance upon the power of Congress absolutely to dispose of it, then I should say it was unconstitutional.

As I understand the argument of the Senator from Florida and other Senators, they would impute to that ordinance of the State of Alabama and the act of Congress in which the two governments concurred an unconstitutional character. They would make it unconstitutional if they undertook to infuse into that ordinance the idea which I understand prevails here, to some extent, that by the making of that ordinance Congress gave up its power to dispose of the public lands otherwise than by sale, or in giving it up assumed as a debt to the States 5 per cent. upon their value. I have not heard as yet much discussion about this branch of this curious trust spoken of, this most important and essential feature of it, namely, at what price did Congress agree that these lands should be sold, and when did Congress give up its right to reduce the price? Upon what hypothesis do you fix a dollar and a quarter an acre as the amount of money which shall be the basis of computation of the 5 per cent.? Is that a part of the contract? Is that understood to be one of its terms?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will say very frankly to the Senator that from my stand-point I do not think it is.

Mr. MORGAN. Very good. Then what is? What is the price of it? What is the extent of the trust created? What is the value of it? What is the measure of it? Suppose we had it before a court for adjudication now and you wanted the trustee to account for the execution of the trust or for his failure to execute it, what would be the measure of the damages to the cestui que trust? None is stated in the compact at all, no price fixed upon the land. Congress can sell it for a quarter of a dollar an acre or one cent an acre if it pleases, and the compact is complied with, so that there is a sale.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The minimum price of land at the present day throughout the United States is $1.25 per acre. I should be glad to see it less. I should like to see the re-enactment of the graduation law under which a class of land after being in the market a term of years could be purchased at twelve and one-half cents per acre. I say to the Senator most frankly that I should be very glad to see that law re-enacted; but the Government itself has established this minimum price and we thought that was a proper view to take as to the valuation of the land.

Mr. MORGAN. But that has not been always the minimum price; some of the lands were down to twelve and a half cents an acre at one time, reduced at the demand of the States, one of the petitioners being my State. Land warrants were allowed to be located upon those lands. How are they to be appraised? At one dollar and a quarter? You admit the power of the Government to reduce the selling price of the lands down to one cent or a fraction of a cent if it pleases. The truth is, Mr. President, that this trust that is claimed here is not a trust in the proper legal signification of the word. It is not a trust that can be enforced, in my humble judgment, against the United States Government, if we were to open every court in this country, whether of law or equity, to the access of the States or to individuals who may suppose they are concerned or interested in this matter. There is no price put on the lands; it is discretionary. The truth is, it is not a trust at all that attaches for one moment of time until the Government in the exercise of its plenary power to sell these lands has sold them and converted them into money.

Mr. LOGAN obtained the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. I understand the Senator from Illinois does not care to go on to-night. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FARLEY. Before that motion is put I wish to submit the following amendment, to be added at the end of the second section of the bill, and I ask that it be printed:

And provided further, That the State of California is hereby placed upon the same footing as regards the 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of all public lands in the said State with the States named herein, and shall be entitled to all benefits and payments to which they or either of them are entitled under this and all previous acts of Congress.

The proposed amendment was ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 19, 1880.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HAYES. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is right. Let us get on with the report of the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour, which will begin at twenty minutes past twelve o'clock.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures are authorized to report at any time. I have a report which I desire to submit from that committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is in order to report from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, which is authorized to report at any time.

MINT AT SAINT LOUIS.

Mr. BLAND, from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 2946) to establish a mint at the city of Saint Louis; which bill and amendments, together with the accompanying report, was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAYES. I now insist upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. That requires a two-thirds vote under the rule. The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 88, noes 25.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. LEWIS said: I make the point of order that no quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LEWIS and Mr. BLACKBURN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 98, noes 54.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the motion of Mr. BLACKBURN to dispense with the morning hour was not agreed to.

ADMISSIONS TO THE FLOOR.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks the privilege of the floor for Hon. J. W. Laird, late a member of the Ohio Legislature; for Judge O'Ferrall, of Virginia; and for B. H. Hill, jr., of Georgia. These requests are made at the instance respectively of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NEAL,] the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS,] and the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SPEER.]

There being no objection, the several requests were granted.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE COURTS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty-seven minutes after twelve o'clock; and the House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4219) to amend sections 1, 2, 3, and 10 of an act to determine the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, and to regulate the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1875. The gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HERBERT,] who occupied the floor at the expiration of the morning hour yesterday, is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, this subject has been so thoroughly and ably discussed that I cannot but feel embarrassed in attempting further to debate it; yet, sir, the measure is one of great importance and the subject is not yet exhausted. This bill is a step in the direction of a return to the wise system of jurisprudence established by the act of 1789. We ought to go further and strike out some recent provisions relating to the removal of criminal causes, but the committee have deemed it wise not to encumber the bill with too many changes of existing law. We believe the country demands now all we have incorporated in the bill and we are seeking practical results. My argument will be addressed only to those two features of the bill assailed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON.]

The gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. HURD] spoke of the condition of the docket of the Supreme Court of the United States, the crowded condition of that docket being such as to render it almost impossible for the judges there to dispatch the business. In 1875 an act was passed by this Congress entitled "An act for facilitating the disposition of causes in the Supreme Court of the United States and for other purposes." That act was reported in this House by that distinguished jurist, Judge Poland, of Vermont. He stated at the time that it was the unanimous report of the Committee on the Judiciary and that he supposed no one could object to the bill. The only reply was made by a gentleman from Massachusetts, General Butler, who said he agreed to that; so that bill was passed through this House, as it was subsequently passed through the Senate, without any discussion at all. Nobody doubted its propriety, no one doubted its wisdom; and yet, Mr. Speaker, the principal provision of that bill was one which raised the amount necessary to enable a party to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from $2,000, where it had been since the passage of the act of 1789, to $5,000; and there was no gentleman on this floor to rise then and say in his place that that act did injustice to the poor man, to the man who, in the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON,] had been able by dint of labor and saving to scrape together as much as a thousand dollars. That act denied to such a man as that the right of appeal.

This right of appeal from the decision of one man or one court to another court is a most valuable right; a right that experience in courts of justice is daily making to be considered more and more valuable in the estimate of every lawyer. There is not a State in this Union that does not provide for the right of appeal from one court to another by constitutional provision. And yet the legislation of this Congress in 1875 and for years past has been such as to multiply by removing into the United States courts the cases in which citizens of the United States are denied the right of appeal.

Mr. Speaker, the House is perhaps becoming anxious to know how much longer this bill is to be discussed. It is taking up the morning and preventing the reports of committees. I therefore think it is proper for me to say that the gentleman having charge of the bill intends, as I learn, to close the discussion in one more hour after the expiration of the present morning hour.

When I was interrupted yesterday by the expiration of the morning hour, I was calling attention to the fact that the result of the legislation of Congress on the subject of the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States for the last ten years has tended very largely to increase the number of cases in which the right of appeal was taken away from the citizen. I stated that this right of appeal was secured in all State courts in some form or other, even for amounts the most inconsiderable, not only by law but by constitutional provision; and it seems to me that this concurrent testimony of the law-makers of all the different States of this Union, all pointing in the same direction, is strong and conclusive evidence to show the value placed by the people of all sections of the Union upon this great right.

If we would know the will of the people we represent I know of no better mode of arriving at that will than by an inspection of the laws they themselves have passed for their own government. If in looking over these laws we find everywhere written—in every organic act, in every system of statutes—the sentiment, "it is against our sense of natural justice, it is not according to due course of law to deprive any man of his property by the judgment of a nisi prius court, he shall have the right of appeal," then, sir, I think we have conclusively and authoritatively arrived at what the will of the people is, what estimate they put on the value of this right and that we ought to respect that will and guard sacredly that right. This bill closes up by $1,500 the gap between $500 and $5,000, which now covers the cases in which the right of appeal is at present denied in our system. In other words this bill says to the poor man of whom the gentleman from Massachusetts spoke, the man who has only $1,000, "you shall not be forced to litigate for that and have it taken away from you by what may be the whim, the caprice, the prejudice, or the error of any one man."

And yet gentlemen on the other side, and especially the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BARBER,] were eloquent in denouncing this bill as erecting the courts of the United States into courts for the rich and not for the poor. Are the poor people in the gentleman's district especially anxious for the privilege of getting into a court from which there is no appeal? If there be in his district any widow of a poor man who spent his daily savings to secure a life policy of a thousand dollars in some foreign insurance company, and if such widow is now prosecuting a suit upon that policy against the insurance company, will she concur with the gentleman that this bill ought to be defeated because it takes from that insurance company the right to remove her cause from the home court into the court of the United States, the right to require her to travel a greater distance, to employ lawyers whom perhaps she is unacquainted with, and to incur additional expenses for attendance of witnesses and there try her case without the right of appeal? If this bill is defeated and she be forced to the alternative of doing all this or of compromising with the insurance company upon its own terms will she concur with her Representative in saying this bill is discriminating against the poor?

But, Mr. Speaker, I will pass now to the second point, and the only point I desire further to consider in connection with this bill. I shall endeavor so far as I may to answer the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] in relation first to the constitutionality, and second to the propriety of that feature of the bill which in effect declares that an incorporated company doing business in any State shall not in suits between itself and citizens of that State be deemed by the United States courts in that State a foreigner, an alien. That is in substance and effect the provision of this bill; and in order to defend that provision it is totally unnecessary to attack any decision that the Supreme Court, or any other court of the United States, has ever made. Those courts in fact have never decided that a corporation is a citizen of a State. When we examine the decisions, when we go to the foundation upon which all these decisions rest, we find it well stated by Chief-Justice Taney in a case in 1 Black, The Ohio and Mississippi Railroad Company vs. Wheeler, where he says the courts have decided that where a corporation has its origin in a State and does business in that State the courts will simply presume that the stockholders and members of that corporation are citizens of that State, and that this intendment is so conclusive that the court will not hear any allegation or proof against it. That is the extent and the only extent to which any decision of any court of the United States has ever gone on this question. In other words, it is simply a fiction indulged by the court for the convenient administration of justice.

Will any gentleman say that if the Constitution of the United States, in so far as it speaks of the jurisdiction of inferior courts of the United States, were self-executing, as it is not, Congress would not even then have the right to say to the courts, "You shall not indulge any presumption; you shall not establish any rule of evidence; you shall admit proof; you shall hear what the facts are, and if all the members of any corporation are indeed citizens of one State, while the other party is a citizen of another, then, and in that event only, you will have the right to entertain jurisdiction?" I think that even the gentleman from Massachusetts would admit this much—that Congress would have the right to declare a rule of evidence, or rather to say that the Supreme Court shall make to itself no such rule of evidence as that upon which it seems to have gone heretofore. In the legislation of every State we find provisions prescribing the rules of evidence according to which the courts shall be governed. A familiar instance of this is in regard to tax sales. In many cases the courts have decided that the tax deed—the deed of the collector—shall be no evidence whatever that any of the prerequisites of the statute necessary to confiscate a man's property by tax sales have been complied with; yet, where the Legislature has prescribed that such deed shall be prima facie evidence that these prerequisites have been complied with, the courts have sustained such legislation.

It is, beyond all doubt, in the power of every Legislature to declare rules of evidence; what they shall be and what they shall not be; and if the gentleman admits that this Congress would have the right so to declare in relation to corporations, namely, that the court should find the facts and base its jurisdiction upon the citizenship of the members of the corporation, then he admits that it is not the charter of incorporation and the fact of doing business in a State that would be looked to. These would not constitute the jurisdictional facts. Citizenship of its members would be the jurisdictional fact. Everything would depend upon this and nothing would depend upon the charter. It would have no effect whatever—would not even be looked at. In other words, if he admits this he admits the power of Congress over these corporations, the power to strike them down at the door of its courts when they would come in, and say, "You shall not come here by virtue of your corporate power; your charter gives you no authority; it gives the court no jurisdiction whatever; your members may, if they have the required citizenship, but that ideal entity, the corporation, is not a citizen."

Mr. Speaker, suppose that in Massachusetts some law had been passed that every citizen of the State had the right to devote as much of his property as he saw proper to the carrying on of any particular business; that Mr. ROBINSON, still retaining citizenship in Massachusetts, had gone into the State of Colorado and engaged there as an individual in the business of mining; would the United States court there in a suit between him and a citizen on a contract made there hear his plea that he was responsible, not personally, not individually, not as a citizen, but only so far responsible as the amount of money he saw proper to risk in that particular business? Would it refuse at his request to render a judgment against him personally and only render a judgment to be collected out of that portion of his property which he had invested in the business of mining? I need not answer the question. The court would undoubtedly answer, "You cannot claim the privileges here of a citizen and at the same time avoid the responsibilities; yet this is exactly what corporations do. In nearly every State the members of a corporation are not personally responsible for any judgment against it. The property only of the corporation is responsible. By going into a corporation the corporations disrobe themselves of the powers and the rights of individuals, at the same time they evade the responsibility of citizens. Has not Congress the power to say to any persons coming into the courts of the Union, "Come here as citizens in your own individual rights and then we will entertain your suit, but if you seek to evade the responsibility which belongs to a citizen by going into a corporation, we will not give you any standing in court?" I say this Congress would have that right by virtue of that general power which all Legislatures have to make discrimination.

"Why," says the gentleman, "shall we discriminate?" Sir, that is what every Legislature does continually. Cooley on Constitutional Law, page 390, speaking of discrimination, says:

These discriminations are made constantly, and the fact that laws are of local or special operation only is not supposed to render them obnoxious in principle. The Legislature may also deem it desirable to prescribe peculiar rules for the several occupations and to establish distinctions in the rights, obligations, duties, and capacities of citizens.

Now, if the Legislature sees proper to establish a distinction between an individual citizen and a citizen coming into the United States court in his corporate capacity, has it not the right, if the reasons for it seem good? Cooley says further:

If the laws be otherwise unobjectionable, all that can be required in these cases is that they be general in their application to the class or locality to which they apply, and they are then public in character, and of their propriety and policy the Legislature must judge.

There are some discriminations we cannot make.

But a statute would not be constitutional which should proscribe a class or a party for opinion's sake.

Now, the gentleman has asked me a question which I will endeavor to answer; and in order that the House may have that question fairly before it, as he put it to me privately, I ask him to state the question from his place.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have listened and have not interrupted any gentleman replying to my argument; but, of course, I accept the invitation the gentleman has given me at this time. He asks me to state to the House the question which I put to him in private conversation yesterday; and, as preliminary to that, I ask him and the House to consider that the replies which have been made as I conceive to the argument I had the honor to submit have been addressed upon the theme of subject-matter and not upon citizenship. The great number of cases which the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee cited yesterday, for instance, those applying to assigned promissory notes, were questions appertaining to subject-matter, and that Congress may well legislate upon. But in no instance has Congress undertaken to say that when it discriminates as to subject-matters that may come before the courts it may also go further and discriminate as to the classes of citizens who shall come into the courts for adjudication on the same subject-matter. I think that distinction is plain, and if the gentlemen who are discussing in opposition to my position will keep that before them they will in my mind make their arguments clearer to the House and of more service in this discussion.

Now, in the direction of that suggestion, I said to the gentleman yesterday in a conversation, "What I want you to do is this: if you say that Congress has the right to discriminate against a class of citizens, I beg you to tell the House whether this Congress may say that the citizens of Montgomery, Alabama, where you reside, shall not go into the Federal courts for adjudication of their rights. If you can discriminate as to a class of citizens, classifying them because of their occupation, then why not because of their locality?"

The gentleman says that Judge Cooley recognizes in his book on Constitutional Limitations—and he will pardon me if I state his point now in order that he may answer the whole ground—that we may make these discriminations, but the same author also says they must not be open to the objection they are discriminations against a class or a party or for opinions, and it is but the next step to say "and for occupations." And all the gentleman's argument against corporations which he makes this morning is this: He says that the court shall be bound by a rule of evidence hereafter; that they shall take evidence to ascertain whether the citizens who call themselves members of a corporation in any State are citizens of that State; but the gentleman leaves a great gap in his argument, because he concedes when citizens of any State, for instance, come together to make a corporation then they ought to have a right to go into the Federal court because of their residence in one State. But this bill excludes all such corporations as well from the Federal courts. I have put my question, and have done more.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman seems to have studied that portion of Cooley which he has quoted very closely, because he quoted almost the exact language used by that author.

Mr. ROBINSON. I quoted it as you read it.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman, however, mistakes one word in the quotation he makes, and he mistakes the meaning of the passage. It reads:

But a statute would not be constitutional which would proscribe a class or party for opinion's sake.

He read that as if it were a statute "will not be constitutional which shall proscribe a class." But it means which shall proscribe any one, any class, or any party "for opinion's sake," and the gentleman has by mistake inserted the word or as if the passage read as he puts it, "shall not make discriminations against a class, or a party, or for opinion's sake," whereas Cooley puts it forbidding discrimination against a class or a party for opinion's sake. He does not say discriminations cannot be made against a class, for he has elsewhere said such discriminations can be made against classes. Here he says, and says only of discriminations against classes, that such discriminations shall not be made against a class "for opinion's sake," or against a party "for opinion's sake." His words are elsewhere that all that is required is that these discriminations shall be "general in their application to the class * * * to which they apply." Why, this is so fundamental, so elementary that the learned author did not deem it necessary to cite authorities for the proposition.

Elsewhere he says:

Laws public in their objects may * * * embrace many subjects or one, and they may extend to all citizens or be confined to particular classes, as minors, or married women, bankers, or traders, and the like.

It will not do, Mr. Speaker, for any gentleman to assert on this floor that Congress has not the power to discriminate between classes if there be any good reason for it. Every Legislature does it. I think in the gentleman's own State—the State of Massachusetts—the right to vote is confined to persons who can read and write. Is not that a discrimination against a class—the class who cannot read or write? I am not quoting this for the purpose of raising any prejudice, but simply as an illustration. It is a distinction drawn by the Legislature of Massachusetts in the exercise of a right which exists under their law as it now stands.

Mr. ROBESON. The right to vote is a political, not a natural right.

Mr. HERBERT. And the right to sue is a political right in a certain sense, because it is always in the control of the people of the State. In a case reported in 14 Peters, Snydam vs. Broadnax, Judge Wayne, in delivering the opinion of the court, uses substantially this language:

Every sovereign State unembarrassed by constitutional limitation could absolutely refuse its citizens the right to sue in its courts, and thus destroy contracts.

Thus clearly extending the power of a State not only so as to reach subject-matter, but parties in all cases. But, sir, the distinction made by the gentleman from New Jersey does not in any manner destroy the force of my illustration. Judge Cooley, in the chapter I am quoting from, makes no distinction between political rights and other rights. He is discussing the broad power of legislation—legislation whether on political or non-political questions. Under the principles he lays down it is competent in legislation on political or non-political questions to make discriminations for sufficient reasons. But the law in Massachusetts would not permit discriminations to be made for opinion's sake. I take it that a law even there which should provide that greenbackers or democrats should not vote would be void. No, Mr. Speaker, I think the illustration is a fair one and that no gentleman who admits the power of a State to proscribe a class and prevent it from voting can fairly deny to Congress the power, for reasons seeming good to it—the power, if it chose to exercise it—of saying to citizens "We will admit you into our courts, but we will not admit that ideal being, a corporation, as a party to any suit whatever in our courts."

But, sir, the bill does not go that far. It only forbids corporations a standing in our courts where they are doing business in the States where the other parties to the same suit have their citizenship. If I show we have the broad power to exclude them altogether we have certainly the power to exclude them in the case mentioned in the bill, and thus, sir, I close up the gap the gentleman finds in my argument. But, sir, the gentleman in restating his whole position in the midst of my speech, which he did with great ingenuity, assumes again the fallacy upon which his whole argument rests. He says we who reply to him argue upon the theme of subject-matter and not of citizenship, and he further says that in no instance has Congress while discriminating as to subject-matter ever undertaken to discriminate as to the classes of citizens who should be allowed to come into court to litigate as to the same subject-matter. Now, sir, if the gentleman means by this to assume that corporations constitute a class of citizens, I think I have already shown this is a mistake. I have said, and I repeat, the courts have never decided a corporation was a citizen. On the contrary, it is expressly decided in Paul vs. Virginia (8 Wallace) and elsewhere that a corporation is not a citizen. To hold that it was would lead to this absurdity: The fourteenth amendment declares that all persons born in the United States are citizens, and we should then read the Declaration of Independence as amended by the fourteenth amendment thus: that "all persons, including corporations, born in the United States are citizens entitled to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness;" and further, that no State should make any distinction against corporations on account of their "race, color, or previous condition."

Sir, I venture to assert that no court ever will decide any such absurd proposition as that a corporation is or can be a citizen. If not, then the question the gentleman puts is whether Congress can discriminate against the class of citizens who have rights in corporations. I reply that I do not claim any right, any power to discriminate against them as citizens. If this bill passes all the citizens interested in the particular class of corporations excluded will still have the same rights as all other citizens, the right to go into court whenever they sue individually; the discrimination is not against them as citizens—they, as such, are in no manner affected except as to one particular subject-matter, when that subject-matter relates to their claim to send their corporations into court, they themselves staying out, then they are indirectly affected because their corporations are excluded. So, sir, ingenious as the gentleman's distinction is, and admitting for the purposes of argument its soundness, it still does not prevent the discrimination he inveighs against. The simple and conclusive reply is that as citizens the persons who are members of such corporations are not discriminated against. All their other rights remain untouched by the bill, but as to one particular right they claim that is taken away from them as from all others who may hereafter choose to put themselves in that condition. There can be no possible distinction between this and the cases quoted by the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky of an assignee not being allowed to sue where his assignor had not such right. Such assignees may as well be called a class as corporations. Assignors as citizens are not excluded, but the courts would not enforce their rights as assignees.

The particular class of corporations here affected are not excluded as citizens, but if this bill passes they will simply no longer have a right to do business in a State and then claim that as to that State they are foreigners.

Sir, on what ground did the Supreme Court put these cases in which it said that an assignee of a promissory note could not maintain a suit unless the original payee might have brought it?

Mr. TUCKER. Is that the payee of mercantile paper or of common-law paper?

Mr. HERBERT. All paper according to the act of 1789, except foreign bills of exchange. A plain promissory note under the act of 1789 made by a citizen of a State to another citizen of the same State could not be transferred so as to give jurisdiction to the United States court in favor of the citizen of another State.

Mr. TUCKER. Did that apply to the indorsee of negotiable paper?

Mr. HERBERT. Not if it was a foreign bill of exchange. It applied to everything else except a foreign bill of exchange. The gentleman's question was probably intended to suggest this idea, and I thank him for it. The plaintiff might show himself to be an indorsee of negotiable paper—an inland bill of exchange—and yet, even though holding thus the legal title, Congress did not permit the United States courts to enforce his right. Did any court ever decide that Congress had not this power? Yet, sir, to buy such paper—inland bills of exchange—was a right every citizen had, a right protected by the common law; a right as much favored as the right to become a member of a corporation. Can it be that Congress would have the power to refuse the aid of the courts of the Union to a citizen to enforce such a right and still not have power to refuse also to enforce the rights he acquired by becoming a stockholder? I can see no difference, and I insist there is none, and that the true rule is that without making any discrimination against a citizen we have the power to prescribe that rights acquired under certain circumstances, or, if the gentleman prefers it that way, particular classes of rights, the courts of the United States are to have no jurisdiction over. We are to judge, and, to use the terminology of the gentleman from Massachusetts, it is our discretion. Without denying to any citizen his equal right in our courts, we are to say what subject-matter—in other words, what contract rights—will give a citizen standing in the courts. The legislative power is to judge of the expediency of the law. When we deem it expedient, all that is required, in the language of Cooley, is that the law be general in its application to the class.

This is an answer also to the gentleman's statement that the doctrine we refer to would empower Congress to exclude, if it desired, only the citizens of a certain town. The right claimed and asserted in the analogous case of assignees includes no such power. I put it on the gentleman's own ground, the power of Congress over the subject-matter—the power to say what contract rights it will permit or authorize to be enforced in the courts of the United States. Certainly, sir, we have the power to say to the citizen, "While we will enforce your rights when you come into our courts in your own person, in your own individual right, subject to our process, yet when you go into a corporation, shuffling off your responsibility as an individual, and seek to send that entity into our courts, we will refuse it admittance." Yet we do not go that far, and there is no intent to do it. We simply desire to put corporations doing business in any State on the same level, so far as the United States courts are concerned, with the citizens of that State.

Mr. Speaker, I have never had any doubt of this power. It seemed to me beyond all doubt on the broad ground taken by the honorable chairman of the committee, the power so repeatedly affirmed by the Supreme Court—the power of Congress to grant or withhold from the inferior courts of the United States any portion of the jurisdiction it was authorized by the Constitution to bestow. It seems to me equally clear upon the ground I have put it, and I should not have argued the question but for the unqualified respect I entertain for the opinions of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts.

And now, sir, let us look for a moment at the reasons why we should pass this bill, and this provision of it particularly to which I am addressing myself. Is there any reason founded in justice why the railroad in my State running one hundred and thirty miles through it, now called the Western Railroad of Alabama, but formerly called the Montgomery and West Point Railroad, should have the right now which it did not have before it changed its name to take any citizen who may have a contest with it anywhere along its line into the United States courts at Montgomery, where they will have no right of appeal unless the amount is over $5,000?

That road is being operated by the same employes with but few changes who operated it before the change of name. It carries passengers in the same cars. It makes its contracts with the very same citizens and through the same agents. But now it has that powersolely because it is owned by two Georgia corporations, acting together as partners, without any act of incorporation whatever from the State of Alabama. It has the right—a right which cannot be justified on any ground whatever, unless upon that attempted to be assumed here, that the owners of these corporations cannot get justice in the State courts. There is nothing in the condition of our State governments, of our State courts, or of the people of the States, that would warrant so unjust an imputation—an imputation that goes to the extent of challenging our very capacity for self-government. Everywhere our State courts are open to all; everywhere those courts are presided over by men learned in the law. And above all and beyond these nisi prius courts in every State is a court of errors and appeals. And if in that higher court justice is not done, that is to say, if any right, if any privilege, any immunity granted by any law or by the Constitution of the United States, is denied, then an appeal lies to the Supreme Court of the United States.

On the other hand, what advantages do the courts of the Union possess over the State courts in the administration of justice? Take the circuit court judges of the United States, Judge Woods, for instance, who presides in the fifth circuit, and goes from Georgia into Florida, Alabama, Louisiana, and Texas. He must preside in all these States and administer in each State a separate system of laws, a system of laws in which he is not specially trained. He is a man of great ability, of great industry, and a thoroughly honest judge. But I submit to this Congress whether even such a judge as that, giving his opinions upon cases as they arise, taking them partly from the lawyers and partly from such reports as are handed to him upon the bench—his docket crowded, and it being impossible for him to clear it in any one court he attends—I ask this Congress if the decisions of that judge, under these circumstances, are better than the decisions of a judge of the State circuit or nisi prius courts presided over by men trained in the laws of that particular State.

And remember, too, that from these nisi prius judges there lies an appeal for any error of law whatever to the highest courts of the States, which courts, after due deliberation and careful consultation of all the authorities, decide upon the law.

Take, if you please, Judge Bradley, of the Supreme Court; and no one has a higher respect for his abilities as a judge and as a lawyer than I have. He will go this spring down south into Georgia to preside there. He has been called there heretofore, perhaps as much as two or three weeks altogether. That is all the time he has been able to spend there in the study of the laws of that State, which, according to the practice, he has to administer when he gets there. His decisions will necessarily be made by consulting in a hurried manner the reports of the supreme court of Georgia. Now, will any gentleman say that those opinions, thus made by even this learned judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, will be more reliable, entitled to greater weight on questions of Georgia law than the opinions of the judges of that State court who have made those decisions? Remember, too, all the time that whenever any Federal question is decided adversely to the claimant in any of these courts of last resort in the State an appeal lies to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Sir, what I have said in relation to the injustice and wrong of allowing railroad companies who contract by agents who are citizens of the State, who deal directly with the citizen, who touch the people of the State at all points, to have an advantage over citizens of that State in the choice of forums applies with almost equal force to insurance companies and other corporations so far as they are affected by this bill.

How, for instance, will a New York insurance company do business in the State of Indiana? It will select as its agent a resident of that State—a man known for his capacity, for his influence, for his acquaintance with the people of the State. Through that agent it will make its contracts. Now, if that agent is capable because of his residence, his acquaintances, and his capacity of making contracts for that insurance company, is there any injustice in saying that he is also capable of attending to lawsuits for them? He knows the lawyers and the jurors, and the presumption is a fair one that he will exercise in attending to lawsuits that same knowledge, capacity, and influence which gave him the position as agent of the company. Now, if a company deals directly in this way through its resident agent, a citizen of the State, with the people of the State under the home laws, it ought to be compelled to seek justice in suits with those citizens in the home courts. It ought not to be allowed to treat them as aliens and as enemies. It ought to be compelled to cultivate the good-will of the people among whom it lives and moves and has its being, its business entity. Corporations, like individuals, may, by a course of fair-dealing with the citizens with whom they are brought in contact, popularize themselves; and, on the other hand, they may by a system of oppression and wrong bring down upon themselves the just and honest indignation of the people whom they oppress.

The gentleman from Massachusetts seems to think that there is much prejudice in some States of this Union against corporations, simply because they are foreign. I deny it. I deny that in any State, anywhere in this Union, there is prejudice against a corporation simply because of the fact that it is a foreign corporation—unless, indeed, by the unjust, the unconscionable, the oppressive use of this unrighteous advantage of removal given to it by the laws of the United States, it has outraged the people among whom it does its business. The only proof of any enmity the gentleman has quoted here consists of statutes passed by the States of Wisconsin and Indiana; and I think his proof signally fails. These statutes do not in any manner show hostility to foreign corporations as such. Why, the gentleman himself says that Indiana still invites foreign capital to come into her midst, in the form of corporations; that Wisconsin still does the same; but he quotes statutes which intend on their face only to prevent these corporations from exercising that right of removal to the United States courts and dragging a citizen away from his home courts. Those statutes prove, abundantly prove, a widespread and deep-seated hostility on the part of the people of those States, not to the foreign corporation, but simply to this right of removal—this superiority over the citizens of a State that corporations claim, even though they are actually resident in the State—as much resident there as anywhere else. And when I speak of corporations being thus resident, I do not speak loosely. It was decided in England, under a statute of Henry VIII, taxing inhabitants owning lands, that a corporation was resident for the purposes of that act in whatever riding or shire it actually was in possession of lands, and that decision is quoted as good law by Lord Coke. That ought to be the law to-day. Corporations can only manifest themselves through their officers, their agents. A natural person cannot occupy two places at once. A corporation can. It has many officers, many agents, all of whom are parts and parcels of it. They can and do reside and act for and manifest the existence of the corporation in widely separate places, in different States at the same time, and many of these corporations permanently exist at the same time in different States. It is nothing but a fiction to say that a corporation can have but one home, a fiction the courts fell into by following a false analogy, a monstrous fiction, ruinous sometimes to the administration of justice. You may go into some of our Western States and Territories to-day and find there immense corporations at work, changing water-courses, felling forests, digging ore, their managing agents contracting daily with the citizens of those States and Territories, all the business apparently transacted there, yet if you want to find the home of one of these corporations you must go to the State of New York because there it had its origin and because in the city of New York in some corner of an office or some nook in a garret sits some gentleman called a president corresponding with the manager in the West. Is it the language of fact or of fiction to say the home of that corporation is in New York?

Take the Credit Mobilier of America. It was originally the Pennsylvania Fiscal Agency, a corporation under a charter from Pennsylvania. By an amendment it became the Credit Mobilier of America. It never I believe did a stroke of work in Pennsylvania, but it spanned half a continent with its mighty railroad west from the Mississippi. It beslimed with corruption the very corridors of this Capitol. Is it anything but fiction to say its home was all the time in Pennsylvania?

Take a case in my own practice. I brought suit by attachment some years since against the Pensacola Lumber Company in Escambia County, Alabama. This corporation was doing the business of milling just over the Florida line. It owned land in Alabama, and contracted with my clients there for logs. When they had invested their all and it owed them large sums and refused to pay, I attached the lands of the company. In a few weeks I was notified that the Pensacola Lumber Company, doing its business of milling in Florida, had gone into bankruptcy in New York, and that thus the attachments were dissolved. I believed the bankruptcy was fraudulent, but my clients were broken and had no money to make a contest in New York. This is one of the practical results of that monstrous, unnatural fiction. One purpose of this bill is to deprive corporations of the benefits of this unnatural fiction—to put them on a level so far as we may with those with whom they transact their business.

Let us do this, Mr. Speaker, and I have no fear that the forebodings of the gentleman from Massachusetts will be realized. He fears that corporations from the North and East will be compelled to withdraw from the South and West. Sir, this, I trust, will not follow. We need capital. We invite it by our laws to come. We will deal justly by those who bring it in our midst. Self-interest, as well as a sense of what is right and just, will prompt us to this course. Money is keener-sighted than politicians, and the men who manage these institutions will soon awake to the fact, to which the legislation of the past ten years has tended to blind them, that fair-minded and fair-dealing persons can rely on each other in all parts of this Union.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia.) The Chair has been informed that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] proposes to yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. WADDILL.] The Chair therefore notifies the gentleman that he has now only ten minutes remaining.

Mr. TUCKER. I move that the gentleman from Alabama be allowed to proceed by unanimous consent till he closes his remarks.

Mr. ROBESON. I hope this request will be agreed to. The gentleman is about to conclude.

Mr. HERBERT. I will not occupy more than five minutes, after which I desire to yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SPARKS. Let it be understood that this will not extend the morning hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour will expire at half past one o'clock.

There being no objection, the motion of Mr. TUCKER was agreed to.

Mr. HERBERT. I am very much obliged to the House for its courtesy.

In conclusion I desire to call attention, which I do with great pleasure, to a remark made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON.] He said in the course of his speech:

Is there any demand that we shall have no United States courts that shall adjudicate upon the rights of citizens of the different States? I think not.

Again, the gentleman says, speaking of these courts:

We want them. We are here to-day with a Union more strongly cemented than ever before—destined to be perpetual.

The gentleman in this part of his speech has given manly utterance to what has come under his observation and must be a familiar truth to every gentleman on this floor—that there is no desire in any quarter to banish the courts of the United States or to deprive them of any portion of their legitimate power. For the South I can speak. The gulf of fire and blood that fifteen years ago separated us from the North is closed forever. The Union is, indeed, in the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts, cemented more firmly than ever. During the earlier years of our history there was talk, now in one quarter and now in another, of disunion. The right of separation was claimed as a reserved right. It was looked to as a possible future contingency. We have begun now an era in which all men know that the Union is indissoluble. Secession is dead—renounced in the constitutions of the Southern States, cast out of the minds of their people. There is no longer any slavery to divide us; and nothing can separate us. This Government is to be ours always—ours in the West and in the East, ours in the North and in the South. Its courts are our courts; its President is our President; its Congress is our Congress; and the glory and strength and justice of these institutions dedicated to freedom are to be the heritage of our children. Every motive of self-interest, every instinct of patriotism, every sentiment of love for our posterity, prompts us so to legislate as to preserve and perpetuate them to the remotest posterity. This bill, I believe, is in that direction.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WADDILL] is now entitled to the ten minutes which remain of the time of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HERBERT.]

Mr. WADDILL. Mr. Speaker, in the short time allotted to me I could not, if I desired, enter into a full discussion of the provisions of this bill. I shall therefore hastily touch upon some of its provisions, involving statutes with the operation of which I am more familiar. I do not propose, sir, any unjust or causeless war upon United States courts as such. The judicial system of the United States has its origin in the Constitution and is essential to our system of government. The objections of thoughtful men are not to the system of a Federal judiciary, but more to the acts of courts in the construction of statutes, and still more to the statutes themselves.

Nor do I propose to indulge in a senseless tirade against corporations. Corporations are creatures of the law, chartered by the people, and in the great majority of cases by the people of the States themselves, and not by the Federal Government. And when operated under proper limitations and checks, they are a great blessing to the people and the country, developing as they do the material resources of the nation, and carrying forward great and gigantic enterprises of internal improvements which no individual could do or would risk his fortune in undertaking. It is when organized without proper restrictions and checks that corporations, which ought to be unmixed blessings, become a curse to the people—when, led on by avarice and greed, they become soulless monsters of oppression to the citizens, overriding in their strength individual rights and converting themselves into selfish and sordid engines of evil and wrong.

Now, sir, I favor this bill because its provisions will relieve the people of many sections of the country of a grievous cause of complaint; because it provides that the rights of the citizen shall be tried by a jury of his peers and of the vicinage; because in the majority of cases it will remit causes to domestic home courts for trial; because it will put a stop to the harassment and burdensome expense of sending honest suitors for trial of their causes hundreds of miles distance from their homes to a strange court, whose modes of procedure, whose methods of trial and practice are alike unknown to him, and where, unknown to all around him, probity, honor, reputation, character, all go for naught.

Mr. Speaker, we hear a great outcry and complaint about United States courts in these days. Numerous bills are now pending in this House to modify and mollify their jurisdiction. Is all this complaint without cause? Are there no reasons for it? Is it a mere passing humor of the people? Sir, there is justice in this outcry. There is reason for this protest. It may at times be unreasonable in its manner, and unmethodical in its assaults, but it has its full justification in the harassments and burdens arising out of the act of 1875 now sought to be partially remedied.

Let us look at its working for a moment. In the district which I have the honor to represent here the United States court division in which one-half of the district is situated is at the nearest point by the usual lines of travel two hundred and seventy-five miles distant from the city where the court is held, and thousands of citizens of my district live from three hundred to three hundred and fifty miles from the place of holding the court. Now, sir, let us illustrate the workings of this law. Mr. Jones, in my district, executes his note to Mr. Smith for $525. The note is, as nearly all notes are now drawn, negotiable. The consideration for which Jones executed the note fails, or for some other cause, constituting a good and meritorious defense, Jones refuses to pay. Smith, through some legal friend, transfers or assigns the note by indorsement for value to a citizen of Illinois, being just across the Mississippi River on the Illinois side, and this citizen of Illinois at once brings suit against Jones in the United States court, three hundred miles from where the contract occurred and the witnesses and original parties to it reside, and so Jones is forced to go to work, employ a lawyer to go three hundred miles away to defend his case, to take his witnesses or testimony that distance, and to appear among strangers in a strange court, and as I said before, with strange modes of procedure, and a strange jury to try his cause; or else he is forced to make an unjust and unwilling compromise of his rights. Now, sir, is this a wholesome law to permit such injustice; to cause a citizen so much trouble and annoyance, and to force upon him such ruinous burdens? Is it strange that Jones should complain of such a law, and, in his ignorance, feel a prejudice against the United States court itself? Is not all this known to his neighbors, and do not they share in his feelings of indignation and injury? Most assuredly.

Now, let us take a hasty glance at the workings of the present law with reference to corporations. It has been again and again decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that a corporation is a citizen of the State under whose authority it receives its charter. Here is a corporation, a life insurance company, chartered by the State authority of Massachusetts or Illinois or South Carolina, I care not which. It comes into the State of Missouri, establishes its branch office in the city of St. Louis, does business continuously all over the State by virtue and authority of the laws of Missouri, and is protected in its rights by those laws. Its agent out in my district insures the life of one of our citizens for $1,000, and shortly after having his life insured for the benefit of his wife and little children the citizen dies. The widow and children are left nothing but the life insurance. The company refuses to pay the insurance money, the widow sues in the circuit court of the county where she lives, where the contract of insurance was entered into, where the premium for it was paid by her husband, and where the company regularly transacts business through its agent. The insurance company as defendant comes into court and states that it is a citizen of another State, the State granting its charter, and ask its cause to be removed to the United States circuit court for that district, and it must be done, and is done. The widow and orphans of this citizen are thus forced to go to trial of their rights, involving all the husband and father left them, three hundred miles away from their home and friends, to get their witnesses and testimony before this strange court, and employ lawyers to go there and fight and contest with this powerful aggregation of capital—this soulless entity of the law—and when the suit is terminated, allowing that the poor plaintiff gains it, the larger part of the little sum is gone for expenses in conducting its prosecution. Or, if she cannot carry on the suit, as is frequently the case—and I may say most frequently—she is compelled to compromise away her rights, and receive such pittance of what was justly hers as this favored corporation may see proper to bestow upon her.

Mr. Speaker, it is said extreme cases test rules. I have put these cases as illustrative of the working of the law of 1875, which is sought to be amended and modified by this bill. And they are not extreme cases as a matter of fact, but of actual occurrence in my part of the country, and I doubt not in numerous other localities. These are mere examples of hundreds of cases which have happened in Missouri and all over the Union. The United States courts are too remote to be the arbiters of the rights of the citizen as a rule. Especially is this so in the South and West, where the suitor often is compelled to travel three and four hundred miles, with his witnesses and counsel, to try his cause. And much of this harassment and expense—in fact, by far the most of it—arises from suits between individuals and corporations doing business in the State where the individual resides, and under and by virtue of the laws of that State, too.

This bill makes no assault upon corporations as such, but only seeks to place the individual citizen on an equal footing with the corporate or artificial citizen in the courts. Where is the wrong to corporations, of which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] so eloquently complains? Is it wrong to say that a corporation doing business in a State, protected by its laws and permitted to go with its goods or business right to the doors of the people of the State, shall only have the same privileges with reference to a forum for trial that the citizens of the State have? Is it an outrage to say that a powerful corporation shall not have the right, while transacting its business under the laws of a State, to drag citizens of that State hundreds of miles from their homes, at great expense and attended with vexatious and often disastrous delays, to a strange court, with its strange procedure, to hear and try their causes which their home courts are perfectly competent to do? Sir, I fail to see the injustice of forbidding to corporations doing business in a State the right of removal to Federal courts when it is not granted to the citizens of a State. The objection to the present bill is that it does not go far enough. Certainly if there is to be any favor shown in the dispensation of justice it should go to the weaker party, the individual citizen, and not as is the case now under the law of 1875, to the stronger, the wealthy and powerful corporations.

Mr. Speaker, the passage of this bill will go largely in the direction of softening the feelings of the people toward corporations. It is notorious that in most parts of the Union to-day there is, not to use a stronger term, a decidedly unfriendly feeling on the part of the citizens against corporations. In my opinion, sir, one great cause of this ill feeling is the privilege granted to corporations by the present law. Under this law they have been enabled to harass and oppress individuals. And in too many instances they have used the power given them by the law relentlessly. They have pursued only their own interests, regardless of the interest of individuals. They have overridden private rights in pursuit of corporate gains. They have in many instances damaged and despoiled the citizen and refused all redress; and when the poor citizen has sought it in the courts, they have so harassed him with delays, expense, and removal of his cause to remote and strange courts, that many, ay, thousands of citizens of this country, to-day look upon corporations with undisguised hostility.

Mr. Speaker, it is the part of statesmanship to remedy this evil, to allay this hostility, to bring into healthy co-operation all the means of bestowing happiness and prosperity upon the people, and of developing the material wealth of the nation.

No thinking man will deny the necessity for corporations in the development of the vast resources of our country, in devising means for the transportation of our immense products, and in carrying forward vast and varied enterprises for the interest and convenience of the people, enterprises which single individual effort and wealth cannot accomplish, but which require the aggregation of men, money, and brains in the form and by the method of bodies-corporate for their successful issue. But, sir, while all this is admitted, it is also true that one of the most sacred duties of the law-making power of this Government is the absolute and perfect protection of the individual citizen in his property and person. No power, however strong; no interest, however important to the Government, must be permitted to trench upon the rights of the citizen.

Sir, the present bill is a step in the direction of the cure of the evils of which I have spoken. It restrains corporations when they most need restraint, and in doing so relieves the citizen. Let corporations be granted and protected in the enjoyment of all just rights in the courts, but give them no rights or privileges not given the individual. Let them be shorn of all power to oppress and harass the people. Remit them to their remedy and their defense in the forum erected where they transact their business, and they will soon conform their acts and policy to the situation, so as to have friends among the people in whose midst they prosecute their labors, and the ill-will and hostility of the people will cease with the departure of its cause. And thus will have been taken a great stride toward the reconciliation of the diverse interests of our country and the unification of all interests for its sublime development.

REVISION OF THE RULES.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CARLISLE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] for the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. LOWE], which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of paragraph 3 insert the following: "which retrenchment shall not be by inference, but shall in express words specify on its face the amount of money to be saved by the amendment."

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. WARNER. If in order I desire at this time to offer the following as an amendment to the pending amendment.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to have the original amendment read to which this is offered.

The amendment of Mr. LOWE was read, as follows:

Provided, however, That no provision or amendment of a partisan character shall be in order.

Mr. WARNER. Now read my amendment to that amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "order" and insert, "except it shall be in order to reduce the expenditure of money authorized or required by such existing law and covered by the bill and to change the law only to the extent necessary to make it conform to such reduction."

The CHAIRMAN. That will be in order if offered as a substitute for the motion to strike out and insert the words proposed by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. WARNER. I offer it as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission of the committee to be heard on this subject for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending clause and all amendments thereto was limited by order of the House to twenty minutes, and that twenty minutes have expired.

Mr. ROBESON. I move the gentleman be allowed to speak by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the Chair will interpose none.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am certainly the last man who would offer any objection to the gentleman from Georgia being heard on this or any other subject which he chose to speak on, but is it in the power of the committee to change the order of the House? I am trying to get a vote on these rules under an order of the Committee on Rules. The House has limited debate to twenty minutes, and that time has expired. I do not understand it is competent for the Committee of the Whole, even by unanimous consent, to rescind that order of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course the committee cannot rescind or change in any respect the order of the House.

Mr. STEPHENS. Except by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The only way the committee could do it would be not to raise a question of order against the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. LOWE. If no objection is raised to the gentleman from Georgia—

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Kentucky has raised the question of order.

Mr. LOWE. Does the gentleman from Kentucky raise the point of order against the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman from Kentucky means just this: If further debate is to be had on this rule it cannot be limited to any one gentleman. We will have to rescind the order of the House limiting debate altogether or else we must execute that order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question, then, is on the adoption of the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SPEER. I move the committee rise for the purpose of extending debate, so the gentleman from Georgia may be heard. This House has never failed to do itself an injustice when it refused to hear the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not understand, Mr. Chairman, it is proper, and I deny the propriety of thrusting anything of a personal character into the matter just now pending here. The disclaimer I made was sufficiently broad to protect the objection from any such criticism. I shall oppose any extension of the time for debate on this rule.

Mr. SPEER. I insist on my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Perhaps the Chair will be pardoned for suggesting to the gentleman from Georgia under the circumstances, even if the committee should rise the time could be extended in the House only by unanimous consent as there was a motion to reconsider, and that motion was laid upon the table.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I shall object.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman still insist?

Mr. SPEER. As the gentleman from Kentucky notifies me he will object, of course I shall not insist.

The CHAIRMAN. The question, then, is on the amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER.]

Mr. HOOKER. I ask for the reading of the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to make a motion. If the majority of the House desire it, I move the committee rise for the purpose of then moving that the House go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union generally.

Mr. HOOKER. Let the amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment to the amendment will be read. Mr. WARNER's amendment to the amendment was again read.

Mr. PAGE. I make the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. HOOKER. So do I. I have not heard it hitherto. I make the point that the committee has voted substantially on that already.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will consider the point of order made and pending, but the first question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan that the committee rise, announcing it as his purpose when the committee gets into the House to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union generally.

Mr. CONGER. For the purpose of hearing the remarks proposed to be made by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS.]

The question being taken on Mr. CONGER's motion, there were—ayes 92, noes 87.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I call for tellers.

Mr. ROBESON. I rise to a parliamentary question. I want to know, for my own information and the information of the House, whether, if the motion prevails in the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union generally, that will simply operate so as to allow the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] to speak, and no longer than that detain the action of the House in again going into Committee of the Whole to consider the revision of the rules?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary question, or one which can be properly addressed to the Chair.

Mr. BLACKBURN. To save time, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Suppose this motion should prevail, would it not require unanimous consent to resolve the House into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union generally?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Very well; I call for tellers.

Mr. CONGER. I had hoped the gentleman who had charge of the rules of the House would have been able to give us that information himself.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman who has charge of the report on the rules will give the gentleman from Michigan that information at the proper time, and a good deal more, if he will only listen patiently.

Mr. CHALMERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know if the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, whether those gentlemen who are down on the list to speak will not be first recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be a question for the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, if the House should resolve itself into that committee.

Mr. CHALMERS. I believe that my name stands first on the list.

Mr. ROBESON. I hope we will go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union notwithstanding that. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEAVER. I desire to say I am on the list and will willingly resign in favor of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HOOKER. I believe tellers have been demanded. I hope we will be allowed to have them.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BLACKBURN and Mr. CONGER were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 101, noes 99.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the report of the Committee on Rules and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union generally. My object is to allow the gentleman from Georgia to address the committee.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I rise to a question of order. In submitting a motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union a gentleman has not the right to state the object he has in making the motion.

Mr. CONGER. That has been done many times in the House when gentlemen have moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The statement of the object is not in order. The Chair will submit the motion. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union generally.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Is it in order by way of amendment to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the report of the Committee on Rules?

The SPEAKER. The same object can be arrived at by voting down the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Have I not the right to offer the motion I have indicated as a substitute for the motion of the gentleman from Michigan?

The SPEAKER. The Chair was bound to recognize the gentleman from Michigan; and the Chair thinks the motion made by that gentleman is not amendable. The remedy is to vote it down.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I call for the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 117, nays 115, not voting 60; as follows:

So the motion of Mr. CONGER was agreed to.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made: Mr. MANNING. My colleague, Mr. MONEY, is paired with Mr. JOYCE, of Vermont; and my colleague, Mr. MULBROW, is paired with Mr. DWIGHT, of New York.

Mr. ROBERTSON. My colleague, Mr. ELAM, is paired with Mr. DICK, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUCKNER. I should vote "no" on this motion, if I were not paired with Mr. CHITTENDEN, of New York.

Mr. WISE. I would vote "no," if I were not paired with Mr. HOUK, of Tennessee.

Mr. WILLIS. My colleague, Mr. THOMAS TURNER, is paired with Mr. MCGOWAN, of Michigan.

Mr. CABELL. I desire to announce that Mr. ROSS, of New Jersey, is paired with Mr. FISHER, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. LOUNSBURY. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. McCook; if he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to announce that Mr. EWING, of Ohio, is paired with Mr. RYAN, of Kansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. MULLER is paired with Mr. WAIT, of Connecticut.

Mr. HISCOCK. On this question I am paired with my colleague, Mr. BLISS.

Mr. CROWLEY. I am paired with Mr. O'BRIEN, of New York.

Mr. EINSTEIN. I am paired with Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey.

Mr. BLAKE. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. ROSS.

Mr. MCGOWAN. I am paired on all political questions with Mr. THOMAS TURNER, of Kentucky. This question having taken a political turn, I decline to vote.

Mr. BAYNE. I am paired with Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. If not paired, I should vote "ay."

Mr. DAVIS, of California. I am paired on all political questions with Mr. HENKLE, of Maryland.

Mr. BOYD. I am paired with Mr. HENRY, of Maryland; if he were present, I should vote "ay."

Mr. TALBOTT. My colleague, Mr. McLANE, is paired with my colleague, Mr. URNER; and my colleague, Mr. HENRY, is paired with Mr. BOYD, of Illinois.

Mr. KLOTZ. I desire to vote.

Mr. CONGER. I wish the Chair would ask the gentleman if he was within the bar before the last name on the roll was called.

Mr. KLOTZ. I was in the Hall during the call of the roll.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman states that he was within the Hall, but outside of the railing.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose the rule would be the proper guide.

The SPEAKER. That is the rule and the practice.

The name of Mr. KLOTZ was then called, and he voted in the negative.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask leave to vote; I was not in during the roll-call.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

Mr. POEHLER. I ask leave to vote.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

Mr. WHITEAKER. I ask leave to vote.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CONGER. There is objection.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. And I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONGER. How did the gentleman vote?

Mr. SPEER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] has not the right to make the motion to reconsider, if it is questioned.

Mr. BLACKBURN. My right to make that motion was not questioned; and it was covered by the motion of the gentleman from Michigan to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, and on that motion I have demanded the yeas and nays, and the Speaker has recognized that demand.

The SPEAKER. The Chair certainly recognized the gentleman, but the Chair will never take advantage—

Mr. GARFIELD. I rose to make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] say that he rose for that purpose?

Mr. GARFIELD. I rose for that purpose, and intended to make the point the first moment I could get the attention of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the fact that the gentleman rose.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say that I did not dream a gentleman having charge of the rules would undertake to make a motion he had no right to make.

Mr. BLACKBURN. There are many things in this world that the gentleman has never dreamed of, but which he ought to know. I made a motion to reconsider. Nobody questioned my right to do it. The gentleman from Michigan recognized my right in moving to lay the motion on the table. On his motion I demanded the yeas and nays. [Cries of "Regular Order."]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is for members to keep order.

Mr. FINLEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to ask the Chair whether it would be in order for me to change my vote with the view to move to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] asks leave to change his vote. Is there objection?

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did recognize the gentleman from Kentucky, no one objecting, and submitted his motion; the demand for the yeas and nays was also submitted. But the Chair accepts the statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that he rose to object to the gentleman from Kentucky making the motion to reconsider.

Several MEMBERS. But he did not do it.

The SPEAKER. Whether he did it or not, the Chair takes the gentleman's word.

Mr. PAGE. I was on my feet myself to object.

The SPEAKER. On the vote just taken the ayes have it; and the House determines to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union generally. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] will take the Chair.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

Mr. CONGER and Mr. BLACKBURN addressed the Chair.

Mr. CONGER. I claim the right to the floor because it was on my motion that the House went into Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to make a statement.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Chair has the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair requests gentlemen to take their seats and be in order.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to announce that the House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for general debate. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] who made the motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

REVISION OF RULES.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, I made this motion in the interest of free speech. [Laughter and applause.] I desired, as others on this side of the Chamber did, the opportunity to hear the views of a distinguished gentleman of this House from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] whose legislative experience, whose familiarity with the rules of this House, dates back to a time when the fierce democracy of the other side believed in free speech, in free discussion, in fairness, the old, hard-fisted Jacksonian democracy of whom we have before us still a living representative, thank God. [Applause.]

Sir, if in the progress of events in this country it happens that that democratic party once so honored, once so respected, once so esteemed, once embracing so large a portion of all the people of the United States of all sections and all regions, has slipped its moorings—if it has been wandering for years upon unknown seas of adventure—if it has forgotten the principles of Jefferson and Madison and Monroe and Jackson, what a glorious thing it is for the country that there still lives and breathes in our midst, with memory unimpaired, with all his intellectual vigor intact, an old representative of the democracy of those days, then a whig, [laughter and applause,] then acting with the whig party, true to the Constitution, but upholding the Jeffersonian ideas of democracy, [laughter and applause,] and to-day acknowledged by all true democrats as a representative of the old-time democracy, honored by them as such, elected by them as such, having brought into the fold the ark of the covenant of whiggery, and placed it in democratic hands. [Laughter and applause.] How fortunate for all of us—and I address myself to my young compatriots of the democratic party—how fortunate for the old representatives of the whig party, how fortunate for the old representatives of the Jeffersonian and Jacksonian democracy, that the ark of the covenant is still held by the gentleman from Georgia, and that he can tell us what the democracy was in the earlier days, what it was when the whig party became the depository of its principles, how he has borne that ark along down through all these scenes of revolution and rebellion, all these driftings of parties, and is ready to present it here to-day.

Sir, is it not wonderful that modern democrats refuse to hear this venerable statesman? I know his sentiments; I know his views; I have read them in his published books. Why should the democracy refuse to listen to him? Yet we have the unwonted spectacle to-day of a refusal to hear, even upon the subject of rules, the gentleman from Georgia! Sir, my friends around me at present, the only living representatives in this House of free speech and fair play, joined by gentlemen from Georgia and by a few others from that side of the House, have at last brought us to a position where my friend may speak.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CONGER. Where the gag is removed from him. And now, sir, with pleasure exceeding that which I have words to express, [laughter,] yielding to the earnest willingness of my friends on this side of the House, yielding to the earnest willingness of the young democracy, even from Kentucky, on that side of the House [laughter] to hear again the old words of democracy from the old and eloquent expounder of their doctrines, I yield as much of my hour as the gentleman from Georgia may desire to occupy. [Laughter and applause on the republican side of the House.] I will give the gentleman all of the hour he may wish, and then I will resume the floor. [Laughter.] If there be any time left I would like to have it. I should like to reply a moment or two after he gets through.

Mr. STEPHENS. I will yield the floor before the expiration of the hour.

Mr. CONGER. I would like to have a moment or two to reply to what the gentleman may say.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Chairman, I am certainly under obligation to the gentleman from Michigan, and to the House, for the privilege of addressing them on this occasion. It was not my purpose in committee before, nor is it my purpose now to speak of the history of parties, democratic or whig, of their principles or my connection with their organizations. I will take occasion, however, to say that my party attachment from the time I entered public life and as long as I shall continue on earth, is as strong and earnest to party, in its right sense, perhaps, as any other who ever lived; I mean to party founded on principle, not to party organization merely. Organizations are ephemeral; principles are incorruptible and live forever. I was reared in the Jeffersonian school of democracy, in which I have lived and moved and had my being, and in it I shall die. Organizations in all things human tend to corruption, and as much so in political party organizations as others.

Now, sir, I did wish to say a few things on Rule XXI and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] without taking into view, however, the question of party organization on this or the other side of the House. It was upon the great principle which I think involved in the amendment. I take this occasion, as my time is not so much limited as it would have been, to say I have taken a deep and profound interest in this codification of the rules. I think I may assume that I have labored as hard in season and out of season to put the system reported to this House in its present shape as any member of that committee. I had not in the discussion of the report consumed but five minutes of the time of the House. The Committee of the Whole had discussed it fully for months—every other member of the Committee on the Revision of the Rules had been heard repeatedly; and, therefore, I did trust I might be permitted ten minutes to give my views on this very important amendment. It is indeed important in my view. The general system reported does certainly embody great improvements. It has simplified, it has codified, it has rendered intelligible the rules of our Government in legislation, and if adopted by the House will accomplish great good. I think I may assume this.

Sir, I said in the five minutes I had before that in the committee on the revision of the rules the first thing done was the adoption of a resolution that we should not report any rule, or any change in existing rules when there was not perfect unanimity in the committee. I mean, that we should not touch any one of the existing rules which did not receive the sanction of every member of the committee; that is, we should touch nothing except by unanimous consent of the committee. This was on my motion. On Rule XXI, as reported, there was diversity of opinion. The committee therefore left it just as we found it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, suppose the House should do the same: of the opposite side of the House I would ask: Are they worsted? Because if you defeat all these rules, we stand, so far as Rule XXI is concerned, just as we are—with the rules of the House as they now are.

I was opposed to that Rule XXI as reported, individually. The right was reserved to us all to oppose its adoption as it stands. Every member of the committee, by mutual agreement, could move any amendment he pleased, or speak or vote against any part of the report which was not carried by unanimity. I was opposed to this rule as it stands in our present system. And why? I do not believe, according to democratic doctrine, Jeffersonian, Madisonian, Jacksonian, and Jeffersonian republicanism also, that it was ever intended that appropriation bills should be encumbered by any other legislation than appropriations. [Applause on the republican side.] Never, sir! If there has been any progress in this country in legislation, it has been in precluding from appropriation bills the incorporation of matters upon them as riders. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD,] if I understood him correctly, the other day said that it was the democratic doctrine to seek redress of grievances by withholding appropriations, standing upon British precedents.

If that be his position—and I so understood it—I repudiate it toto celo. [Applause on the republican side.] Never was there any such doctrine announced in any authorized democratic creed I ever heard of. It has its origin in a monarchical government where there is no written constitution. This doctrine came from England. Withholding appropriations there has been, and is to-day, a legitimate mode of seeking redress of grievances, because that is a monarchy. Powers are not divided there as here. We live under a government founded upon a written constitution; we live in a free representative republic. Here sovereignty does not reside in a crown. There (in England) all sovereign powers are considered as inherent in the Crown; and the Commons, the representatives of the people, for centuries in granting supplies, which is their right, have held the power in their hands to withhold them until their grievances have been redressed. In this way the petition of right, if you please, habeas corpus, or any other of the great and essential rights of British subjects were secured, from Magna Charta down, and of which American citizens may well be proud to-day.

But, sir, we live under a different form of government. Ours is a written constitution. We present to the world a system of government unknown in the annals of history. Our sovereign powers are all held in trust—none are inherent in those who exercise them; they are divided into three departments, the legislative, executive, and judicial, each separate, co-ordinate, and coequal departments, each one within its own sphere exercising that class of sovereign powers delegated to it. Under our Constitution the powers delegated to Congress (the legislative department) are specified and enumerated. The powers delegated to the President—the Executive—are specified and enumerated. The powers delegated to the judiciary are specially enumerated—all limited and all equally sovereign within their respective spheres under that fundamental law, the Constitution of the United States. Redress of grievances is not provided for in our Constitution by withholding the necessary supplies to carry on the machinery of government as established. The redress of grievances in this country, the repeal of obnoxious laws or other wrongs, is through the peaceful instrumentalities of the organic law, first by an appeal to the legislative body to take off any oppressive burden. The next is to the judiciary—to the courts. And the last to the ballot-box, to the masses of the people at the polls.

Under our written organic law there are no inherent or hereditary rights in the Executive, in members of the Senate or the House, or any other officer of the Government. With us two years is the limit of our service in the House. It is six years in the Senate and four years for the Executive. But, mark you, in the Constitution of the United States the Executive has the same power—rightful power, constitutional power—to veto a bill that we have to pass it. It is his constitutional right to do so if he sees fit.

Now, then, if the House or if Congress should set up a new doctrine of so loading an appropriation bill with a repeal of laws which we do not like—many of them I do not like—but if we do that with a view to seek redress by waging a war upon the veto or the constitutional exercise of it by the Executive, I ask the House and this country, not if it be democracy or republicanism, but is it not anti-constitutional? I state that the President has as much right to veto as we have to pass. Then, as to this veto power, it has from the beginning been, as I understand it, a democratic doctrine to sustain, uphold, and maintain it. The only war waged against it was by those old whigs to whom the gentleman from Michigan alluded. I did belong to that organization under the lead of the gifted Clay—clarum et venerabile nomen. His is one of the few immortal names that were not born to die. But exercising that independence of thought and action which I do to-day, I disagreed with him and his organization at that time on that point or article in his creed. But where stood the entire democratic party organization of that period, if I should be disposed to say anything about party politics on this occasion? They stood solid, North and South, in maintaining the Constitution as it was. When and where has the democratic party—the true Jeffersonian democracy, to which then and now I belong—ever changed their position on this subject? In this creed I was born and reared, and in it I will die. Whoever may make departures from it can do so, but I never shall. I shall still cling to the ark of the covenant of our fathers and the time-honored creed of Jeffersonian democracy and old Jeffersonian republicanism.

But, Mr. Chairman, it was not my purpose to refer to that old political history. I want to speak of our rules. I want these rules which we have passed, and which we are now considering, not to be made or shaped with any view to the advantage or disadvantage of one party or another. In forming the fundamental law, constitutional or other organic law, all wise and true men should look to that system which will work best for the maintenance of right and justice in the great future. It is immaterial which party is in power. I am, as I have said, against all political riders, so called, upon appropriation bills and such riders as are intended to coerce executive action. In this I think I am maintaining nothing but what the advanced thought of the age in political science the world over has already arrived at. I say here that in my sixteen years of experience in Congress, before the late separation or war, more corruption and the most mischievous of all legislation which ever occurred during that time, so far as I am aware, came from riders, or amendments to appropriation bills—amendments that could not be passed on their own merits. So greatly was this recognized as the fact that when those members of the old Congress met in Montgomery to make a new constitution, as the gentleman from Michigan referred to it the other day, one of the great wants, as we thought, and I acting my part in it thought, was in that fundamental law to put "the sting of disability in the temptation," to use the language of my able and most distinguished colleague on that occasion, [Mr. Toombs,] in the very constitution of the republic.

The first constitution made for one year—the provisional constitution—had a provision which was referred to by the gentleman from Michigan, the other day, in these words, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The President may veto any appropriation or appropriations, and approve any other appropriation or appropriations in the same bill.—Article 1, section 5, paragraph 1.

Mr. STEPHENS. That was what was done in the provisional constitution, which remedied the great evil to a considerable extent. I ask the Clerk to read what were the provisions in the permanent constitution.

The Clerk read as follows.

ARTICLE I.

SEC. 9, par. 9. Congress shall appropriate no money from the treasury except by a vote of two-thirds of both houses, taken by yeas and nays, unless it be asked and estimated for by some one of the heads of departments and submitted to congress by the president; or for the purpose of paying its own expenses and contingencies; or for the payment of claims against the Confederate States, the justice of which shall have been judicially declared by a tribunal for the investigation of claims against the government, which it is hereby made the duty of congress to establish.

SEC. 10. All bills appropriating money shall specify in Federal currency the exact amount of each appropriation and the purposes for which it is made; and congress shall grant no extra compensation to any public contractor, officer, agent, or servant after such contract shall have been made or such service rendered.

Paragraph 20. Every law, or every resolution having the force of law, shall relate to but one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title.

Mr. STEPHENS. These extracts need no explanation. But, Mr. Chairman, what I wish understood is that what I have asserted here to-day is no new-born idea with me with a view to advance the interest of one party or another on this floor or in the country, but to advance and secure the interests and prosperity of the people everywhere.

The principles embodied in these extracts were the matured thought of years before; they were wisely incorporated in the Confederate States constitution, and I would be glad to see them to-day incorporated not only in the rules of this House but as an amendment in our present Federal Constitution. They are conservative in their character; they watch and guard the Treasury and protect the rights of the people, and especially the money of the people.

Gentlemen on this side of the House speak of being desirous of economy. Economy! Yes; that is the cry—economy! I am for economy, and I say the best way in the world to have true, real, lasting, good economy is to shut down the door and put bonds upon your appropriation committees. [Applause.] That is the best way to have economy. Let these bills be confined to the requirements of existing laws.

I stated that I was but maintaining the advanced thought of civilization in the science of government. Why, sir, a number of the States of this Union—how many I really do not know—have taken the lead in this matter. I am but following in their footsteps. I am told by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] that that State has incorporated a similar provision in its constitution. I send to the desk and the Clerk will please read what is the provision of the constitution of Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

The general appropriation bill shall embrace nothing except appropriations fixed by previous law, the ordinary expenses of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments of the government, payment of the public debt and interest thereon, and for the support of public institutions and the educational interests of the State. All other appropriations shall be made by separate bills, each embracing but one subject.—Georgia Constitution, 1879, article 3, section 7, paragraph 9.

Mr. STEPHENS. I am for the same rule here that I aided by my advice and counsel in getting established in the new constitution in Georgia. I would, if I could, myself have incorporated in the rules of this House the identical idea that is in the constitution of my native State.

We have been asked what becomes of the Committee on Appropriations? Why, sir, that committee will have its hands full enough to bring forward appropriations according to the estimates under existing laws—labor enough if they will do it well. The labor of that committee is immense when restricted to its legitimate duties. Let them bring forward their bills precisely in the way stated in the Georgia constitution, and who will be harmed by it? Does the proposed amendment prevent that committee from reporting any bill of reform or retrenchment it may see fit? Not at all. The amendment leaves them as untrammelled in reducing expenses as they will be without it. Is their power not unlimited in that respect even with the amendment? If retrenchment is the object, I am for it. If reform is the object, I am for it. Does the power laid down in the Georgia constitution or what I propose prohibit them from going on in that direction if they choose? It does not.

Suppose in this twenty-first rule reported by the committee it should be moved to strike out everything after the word "progress," I would vote for that rather than let it stand as it is. But I prefer the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER.] I am willing to compromise on that. But I would be willing to vote for striking out the whole of that last sentence. Suppose you do that, will it prevent the Committee on Appropriations from introducing a bill to reduce expenditures in anything under existing laws? No. Will it prevent them from bringing forward any bill of reform? No. Will it prevent any other committee of this House or any member from bringing in a bill to change or repeal an obnoxious law? It will not. If they see fit to reform the Army or to reform any of the other departments of the Government, or to reduce salaries generally, is not the door just as wide as it is now? I think so.

My opinion, therefore, is as I stated at the beginning, that in the appropriation bills there should be no rider. I will state to the committee frankly that one reason why I feel so much interest in this question is found in the intimation of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD,] to whom I have alluded, that gentlemen want the rule to stand as it is, that a majority of the House may use it to tack riders on appropriation bills, which appropriation bills must pass or ought to pass, such as the Constitution requires us to pass, and thereby to force the redress of grievances, or the repeal of obnoxious laws, and thus to compel the executive sanction or stop the wheels of government. That is the intimation, as I understand it. Well, sir, my opinion on that subject was very clearly given, not to the world, but to that gentleman and the democratic caucus, when that scheme was tried at the last session. I was opposed to it then; I am opposed to it now, and shall forever be opposed to any such tacking legislation. [Applause.] Hence I think it best that there should be no door for such tacking in the reformation of our rules. There should be no loophole left for allowing any such legislation to be ruled in order.

I again thank the House for this indulgence to me. Had I been permitted to speak when I wished I would not have occupied ten minutes. I yield the floor back to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. CONGER. I feel unwilling to detain the House from the consideration of the rules, which is a matter of pressing importance; and having now accomplished the object in behalf of free speech and fair play which I desired, if there be no others who wish to discuss this matter I move that the committee rise.

The question being taken on the motion that the committee rise, there were—ayes 104, noes 8.

So (further count not being called for) the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Unless it be the pleasure of the House to waste more time, I will now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding with the further consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Before that motion is put I desire to move that the House take a recess from half past four until half past seven o'clock p. m., for the purpose of further considering the report of the Committee on Rules. If we are to have any legislation this session we should conclude the consideration of that report.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] yield for that motion?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am willing that there shall be a vote upon it.

Mr. CONGER. I take exception to the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky—

A MEMBER. It is too late.

The SPEAKER. There has been intervening business.

Mr. CONGER. It is in regard to the present business. The gentleman said that in order to waste no more time—

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman said no such thing.

The SPEAKER. There has been intervening business.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. TOWNSEND, of Illinois; and it was not agreed to.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. BLACKBURN; and it was agreed to.

REVISION OF THE RULES.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CARLISLE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules. The pending question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER,] upon which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] makes the point of order that the amendment is not in order. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] will be read.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "order," in the last sentence of the third clause of Rule XXI, and insert the following:

Except that it shall be in order to reduce the expenditure of money authorized or required by such existing law and covered by the bill, and to change the law only to the extent necessary to make it conform to such reduction.

So that the clause, if amended, would read as follows:

3. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except that it shall be in order to reduce the expenditure of money authorized or required by such existing law and covered by the bill, and to change the law only to the extent necessary to make it conform to such reduction.

Mr. HOOKER. I make the point of order that substantially the same amendment has already been offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] and voted down by the committee. It is true that the pending amendment proposes to strike out something more of the twenty-first rule than did the original amendment; but in substance and reality it proposes to bring the Committee of the Whole to a vote again upon substantially the very same subject-matter that it has already voted down. I therefore hold that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. WARNER. The amendment offered by me some days since, and voted upon in Committee of the Whole, was not the same as this amendment. I think no amendment has heretofore been submitted proposing specifically to limit the change of law so as to make it conform to the reduction of expenditure proposed. I think, therefore, my amendment is clearly in order, as it has not previously been submitted to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has carefully compared the two amendments. While it is evident to the Chair that they are intended to accomplish the same purpose, there is so much difference in their phraseology that the Chair does not feel disposed to take the responsibility of deciding that they are the same thing. The Clerk will read the amendment which was offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] the other day and rejected by a vote of the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of the third clause all after the word "order," in the last sentence, and insert the following:

Except that it shall be in order to reduce the amounts of money provided for by existing law and covered by the bill, and to that extent only to change the law.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair has already observed, the object of the two amendments is undoubtedly the same, but they are couched in very different language, and may be very different things. For instance, in one amendment the words "amounts of money" are used; whereas in the other the words "expenditure of money authorized or required by such existing law" are used. And the concluding portions of the two amendments are in quite different language. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order, and will submit the amendment to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Chair rules the amendment to be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair having doubts upon the subject has deemed it best to submit the question to the Committee of the Whole. The question was then taken by a viva voce vote, and before the result was announced

Mr. WARNER called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WARNER and Mr. BLACKBURN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 117, noes 109.

So the amendment submitted by Mr. WARNER was agreed to.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I give notice that I will call for the yeas and nays in the House.

Mr. MILLS. I move to amend the third clause of Rule XXI as amended, by adding thereto the following:

But any amendment reducing customs and internal-revenue taxes shall be in order on any appropriation bill.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that that is not germane to the subject-matter of the pending clause.

Mr. MILLS. There is no rule that amendments shall be germane. We are now making rules not in accordance with any previous rules of the House, but whatever rules we may please to make, under the Constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. The subject under consideration by the Committee of the Whole is the proposed revision of the rules of the House. Of course it must be in order to move any amendment which proposes to change any existing rule or to establish a new rule.

Mr. CONGER. My point of order is that the proposed amendment is not germane to the pending clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has had occasion heretofore to decide that it was not the duty of the presiding officer of this committee to say where a particular provision should be inserted in the report of the Committee on Rules; that is within the province of the Committee of the Whole. The Chair therefore would not rule an amendment out of order because it was not germane to a particular clause under consideration, for the Committee of the Whole might deem it proper to put the amendment in that place rather than where the Chair might think it ought to be put.

Mr. CONGER. But if the Chair please, we have followed this revision by paragraphs as if they were sections of a bill; and we cannot go back to a former paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas does not propose to return to any former paragraph. He proposes to add this to the clause or paragraph now under consideration. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order.

The question being taken, the amendment was not agreed to; there being—ayes 24, noes 86.

Mr. MILLS. I move to amend by adding the following:

And any amendment shall be in order that provides for the retirement of the circulation of national banks, or that prohibits the renewal of their charters.

The question being put on the amendment, there were ayes 61.

Before the negative side was counted,

Mr. FINLEY called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MILLS and Mr. CONGER were appointed.

Mr. CONGER. I am in favor of the adoption of the amendment in the Committee of the Whole, that we may have a vote in the House by yeas and nays.

Mr. MILLS. I will agree to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] will please act as a teller, instead of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 99. So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I move to amend by adding the following:

And any amendment shall be in order that provides for the coinage of silver upon the same terms as gold.

Mr. CONGER. Is that an addition to the clause or an amendment of an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has proposed it, the Chair understands, as an addition to the clause which has been amended by vote of the committee.

Mr. CONGER. So that it does not affect the amendment already adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Not at all.

The question being put, there were ayes 55.

Before the negative side was counted,

Mr. MILLS called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The negative vote being taken, there were noes 81.

Mr. COOK. No quorum has voted.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the committee may give unanimous consent that a vote by yeas and nays be taken on this proposition in the House. [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COOK] insist on the point that no quorum has voted?

Mr. COOK. I withdraw it.

Mr. FINLEY. I renew it.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MILLS and Mr. GARFIELD were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 34, noes 114. So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] indicated an amendment; when will that be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey would have been in order at the time he sent it to the desk, if other amendments had not been pending; but since that time the committee has adopted the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] which strikes out the very words that the gentleman from New Jersey proposed to strike out, and inserts other words in lieu of them. The Chair is therefore of opinion that the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey, in the form indicated by him the other day, would not now be in order.

Mr. ROBESON. I move, then, to strike out all after the word "changing," and to insert "the effect of existing law be in order."

The CHAIRMAN. This amendment differs from the other, and is in order.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let it be reduced to writing.

Mr. SPRINGER. Would not this amendment strike out the amendment adopted on motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER?]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands; but the gentleman from New Jersey proposes to strike out that amendment and something along with it, which makes it in order.

Mr. ROBESON. I offer this amendment, Mr. Chairman, in order to present the square issue whether we shall have any "riders."

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The square issue is not whether we shall have any "riders" but whether we shall have any economy.

Mr. PAGE. I ask that the clause as already amended by the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk, before reading the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey, will report the clause as it now stands amended by the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except that it shall be in order to reduce the expenditure of money authorized or required by such existing law and covered by the bill, and to change the law only to the extent necessary to make it conform to such reduction.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] proposes to amend so that the clause will stand as the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing the effect of existing law be in order.

Mr. WARNER. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New Jersey be adopted, will it strike out the amendment already offered by myself and adopted by the Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. It does.

Mr. ROBESON. And that is what it is intended to do.

Mr. WARNER. I only wanted to know.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does this take the place of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio?

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition is now to strike out that part of the clause which was adopted on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, and along with it other matter which was reported by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. ATKINS. Have it read again.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been twice reported. Is there objection? There was no objection, and the amendment was again read.

Mr. BLOUNT demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ROBESON and Mr. WARNER were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 115, noes 43.

So Mr. ROBESON's amendment was adopted.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I give notice I shall demand the yeas and nays on this in the House.

Mr. MORRISON. I offer what I send to the Clerk's desk as a substitute for the clause as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill: Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditure.

Mr. BLACKBURN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MORRISON and Mr. GARFIELD were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 123, noes 95. So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer the following as an addition:

But no proposition or amendment shall be in order except as to amounts of money.

I want to restrict all the changes provided for to money.

Mr. MCMAHON. I make the point of order on that. The committee has already agreed to this clause in the shape it is. This is inconsistent with it.

Mr. GARFIELD. This is an addition.

Mr. MCMAHON. But it is inconsistent with the clause as the committee has adopted it.

The CHAIRMAN. Whether it is or not is a question for the committee to determine. The committee can always add a proviso.

Mr. GARFIELD demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. BLACKBURN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 109, noes 122.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WHITE. I move to strike out all after the word "progress" in the original clause reported by the committee. Then the amendment of the House has inserted and added to the original report of the committee certain written matter. I propose to strike out some of the lines of the original proposition together with what has been lately inserted. That is in order.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Is that in order? I make the point it is not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks he understands the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It is to strike out a part of what has just been inserted by a vote of the committee. The gentleman says that is in order because he proposes to strike out with that some part of the original report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. WHITE. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order, for that brings it within the rules.

Mr. WHITE. I apprehend the point of order is not well taken. It is competent to strike out part of the original proposition together with what has been just inserted by the House. That is not like an independent proposition of striking out what has been inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will remember the gentleman from Illinois in his amendment incorporated the whole of the first part of the report made by the Committee on Rules, and the committee by its vote just taken have agreed expressly not only to the new matter which the gentleman from Illinois proposes but to the original matter which the Committee on Rules reported.

Mr. WHITE. I understand that.

The CHAIRMAN. Now the gentleman proposes to strike out a part of the very matter that the committee has agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS. I wish to say a few words upon the point of order. As I understand it, the text of the report of the Committee on Rules has been amended by the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Georgia that the whole of clause No. 3, as reported by the Committee on Rules, has been stricken out on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, and a new clause inserted as a substitute.

Mr. STEPHENS. The whole of it?

The CHAIRMAN. The whole of it. That was the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois which was agreed to by the committee.

Mr. LOWE. I propose to amend the clause.

Mr. STEPHENS. I trust that the point of order may be decided now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already decided that point.

Mr. HOOKER. I submit that the point of order is no longer debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands, the gentleman from Alabama now rises to propose an amendment.

Mr. WHITE. I understand that the gentleman from Georgia desires to debate the point of order.

Mr. HOOKER. I understood that the point of order had already been decided by the Chair.

Mr. STEPHENS. I ask for the reading of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That has been passed.

Mr. STEPHENS. I wish to have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks that the amendment already voted upon be read. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky objects.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What is before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. Nothing, unless the gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment. The Chair understood the gentleman to rise for the purpose of offering an amendment. Does the gentleman desire to offer an amendment?

Mr. LOWE. I do. I ask it to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That no provision or amendment of a partisan character shall be in order.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 61, noes 102.

Mr. LOWE demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LOWE and Mr. BLACKBURN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 114.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

4. No bill or resolution shall at any time be amended by annexing thereto or incorporating therewith the substance of any other bill or resolution pending before the House.

5. All bills for improvement of rivers and harbors and for the establishment or change of post-routes shall be delivered to the Clerk, as in the case of petitions and memorials, for reference to appropriate committees.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to offer an amendment to this clause 5.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend clause 5 by inserting after the word "all," in the first line, the following words: "private bills and:" making it read, "all private bills and bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and for the establishment or change of post-routes," &c.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to say a word upon that amendment. It simply provides that all private bills shall be put into the petition-box the same as bills for the establishment of post-routes and petitions or memorials. They will then go to their appropriate committees, the same as petitions go, and when reported to the House by the committee it will be in order to print them, but not otherwise. Up to this time we have had introduced into this Congress near five thousand bills, the great majority of them being of a private nature, and we have been compelled not only to print them at great expense but to wait here until the Journal of each day has been read. Now, this proposition is for the purpose of economizing time and money by requiring that all these private bills shall go in the first instance to the committee as petitions are now referred, and if reported by a committee they can then be printed, and not otherwise.

Mr. MILLS. Let me say to the gentleman from Illinois that I have had some experience in that direction myself. I can refer him to an instance where I had a private bill which was sent to a committee and lost, and I was unable to obtain any information whatever in reference to it. What is to be done in such a case as that?

Mr. SPRINGER. Introduce another bill. It would take the gentleman but a very short time to write another or get it ready for presentation.

Mr. MILLS. All of these bills ought to be printed; it costs but little and is a matter of safety as well as convenience.

Mr. SPRINGER. The great bulk of these bills are merely for pensions and private claims of various kinds, and the expense of printing them ought to be avoided when there is no necessity for it.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, upon this point I desire to say a few words. Among all these bills which come in under the name of private bills—

Mr. DUNNELL. Will the gentleman yield until the amendment can be again read?

The proposed amendment was again read.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, there are bills which would be called private bills, and would be ruled to be such, embracing frequently very large amounts. I think it would be the desire of every one that bills introduced here to which the attention of the House is called should be printed, so that we can have opportunity to know their contents and examine them, and be prepared with our views to act intelligently upon them before the committee report. They ought to be printed, and there is no reason why they should be sent to the committee without printing any more than a great number of unimportant public bills. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Of course bills as to harbor and river improvements can be sent without printing, because they go to a committee which prepares a general bill. So with bills in reference to postal routes. They may be sent to the box, because they have to be incorporated in a general bill. But private bills must all be considered separately. They do not go into one general bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no objection to the printing of private bills if anybody wants them printed.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] whether his amendment proposes a continuation of the present rule that private bills shall not be printed?

Mr. SPRINGER. The present rule, which provides that private bills shall not be printed when they have been printed by a previous Congress, will remain in force, if a part of this revision and adopted. It was thought unnecessary to have these bills printed which are introduced session after session, and can be found in the document-room.

Mr. DUNNELL. But under the practical operation of the new rule bills that are private without any exception are not printed, whether they have been previously printed or not.

Mr. SPRINGER. It may be provided at a subsequent point in the revision that such private bills as have not heretofore been printed shall be printed.

Mr. DUNNELL. I think all bills, private and public, should be printed, and then we will have but one place to go to to find all the bills and know what they are. Now we have to go to the document-room for public bills and to the file-room for private bills, which is exceedingly inconvenient.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CHALMERS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to clause 5 of Rule XXI the following:

For the consideration, preparation, and report of the river and harbor bill the Committee on Commerce shall consist of thirty-eight members, one of whom shall be selected from each State, and that the Speaker shall at once add to the present committee one member from each State not now represented thereon.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, it seems from the action of the House that the river and harbor bill must necessarily be completed in the committee-room. I desire to say that this amendment is offered after consultation with the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and while I do not say he is in favor of it he certainly did not indicate any opposition. Upon the contrary, he agreed with me that every State in this Union should have a representative upon the Committee on Commerce in the preparation of the river and harbor bill. It is not intended by this amendment to add to the committee so as to prevent it from being sufficiently small to work well. The amendment simply applies to the river and harbor bill and not to general questions of commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. There is too much confusion. The gentleman from Mississippi will please suspend until order is restored.

Mr. CHALMERS. As I said before, inasmuch as the practice of the House now is well established that the river and harbor bill as perfected in the committee-room becomes the law of the land, it is essential that every State in the Union should have some voice in the preparation of that bill while it is passing through the committee. As it is now, some of the most important States, as the State of Mississippi and the State of Tennessee, both of which are deeply interested in rivers and harbors and their improvement, have no representative on the Committee on Commerce; California has no representative on the Committee on Commerce. I maintain that every State should at least have a representative on that committee in the preparation of that bill, that equal and exact justice should be done to all parts of the country.

I hope gentlemen will think well before they oppose this amendment. It is not brought here in any factious spirit. It is true I made as much of a fight as I could for the Mississippi Levee Committee; but that committee, as we all know, was killed by the action of this Committee of the Whole. The determination to permit the river and harbor bill to be prepared in the committee-room of the Committee on Commerce and then to be passed in this House is the clear declaration on the part of a majority of this House that that is the proper and best way to prepare such a bill.

South Carolina, I believe, has no representative on this committee. There are but fifteen members on it and there are thirty-eight States. If it was intended to extend the membership of the committee to thirty-eight for all the considerations of commerce it might become too unwieldy. The gentleman from Georgia suggested a moment ago it might be necessary in that case to build an extra room to put them in. That is not a good objection since the proposition applies simply to a single bill. It does not interfere with the ordinary legislation considered by the Committee on Commerce. We are all deeply interested in this subject and I hope gentlemen will reflect well before they reject the proposition I have submitted.

The question being taken on agreeing to Mr. CHALMERS's amendment, there were—ayes 36, noes 70.
So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. OSCAR TURNER] desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. HAYES. I move that the committee rise.

The question being taken on the motion that the committee rise, there were—ayes 83, noes 104.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Rule XXI by adding as a sixth clause the following:

Upon all bills or resolutions appropriating money or creating a charge or debt upon the people the yeas and nays shall be taken on the final passage of such bills in the House, and entered on the Journal.

Mr. CONGER. Have we not passed to the next rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has passed from the fifth clause of Rule XXI; but the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. OSCAR TURNER] proposes to add a sixth clause to that rule.

Mr. PHISTER. As my colleague [Mr. OSCAR TURNER] may desire to submit some observations to the committee upon his amendment, I will move that the committee now rise. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let him take his five minutes now; he can only have five minutes.

Mr. PHISTER. I will not press the motion.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. Mr. Chairman, as I argued this question at the time I gave notice that I would offer this amendment, I do not feel inclined again to trespass upon the time of the committee; but as there may be some members present who were not then, I shall briefly refer to the points that strike my mind, showing conclusively that this amendment, or one embodying the same principle to some extent at least, ought to be adopted. Bills making appropriation of public money have for many years been passed by this House without the call of the yeas and nays. Indeed, the journals show that they are rarely called unless there is some political rider upon the bills or extraneous legislation in them. The result of this is that frequently, in the hurry of legislation and the noise and confusion, although the attention of members is invited by the Speaker to these bills, very few vote upon their passage. It is a fact well known to every member of this House that many bills appropriating millions of the public money pass here by the votes of perhaps four or five members; it may be the votes only of those constituting the committee from which the bills come.

These are facts that no gentleman will deny. Now, sir, this is all wrong. No appropriation of money ought to pass unless the attention of members is drawn directly to the passage of the bill, and no such bill ought to pass without it is voted for by a majority of all the members elected. Now, how are you to effect this result? I know of no way except to require the yeas and nays upon all bills appropriating public money. It is no new idea. Look, Mr. Chairman, at the array of States in this Union that have adopted this provision in their constitutions. I referred in my remarks before to seven States; since then I find that the provision is incorporated in the constitutions of the following States, twenty-two in number:

|------------------|----------------|-----------------|---------------------|
| 1. New York. | 7. Alabama. | 13. Indiana. | 19. North Carolina. |
| 2. Pennsylvania. | 8. Arkansas. | 14. Kansas. | 20. Ohio. |
| 3. Virginia. | 9. California. | 15. Missouri. | 21. Oregon. |
| 4. Maryland. | 10. Colorado. | 16. Nebraska. | 22. Tennessee. |
| 5. Minnesota. | 11. Florida. | 17. Nevada. | |
| 6. Wisconsin. | 12. Illinois. | 18. New Jersey. | |

Kentucky requires yeas and nays on all bills appropriating over $100. Many of the old States had tried for over half a century to do without this safeguard of the peoples' money, but it would not do; they were forced to amend their constitutions and incorporate this provision in them. I will refer to the great States of New York and Pennsylvania, which adopted this provision in 1873, and Kentucky and Virginia in 1850 and 1851. Now, sir, if it is right in the State constitutions why is it not right here? Are the taxes less burdensome on the people when imposed by Congress than by the States? Sir, there is greater reason for it here, for where the Legislatures of the States vote away hundreds of dollars we vote away millions, all coming out of the pockets of the toiling millions of the country.

I have heard but one member urge a reason against this amendment, and that was that it would take too much time. Are the people to be told by us that we have not time to call the yeas and nays upon bills appropriating their money? We are paid by the year and let us take the time. Why, sir, the yeas and nays are called hundreds of times every session upon unimportant questions, frequently even upon the question of daily adjournment. Yet we are told upon these important bills we have not the time. Mr. Chairman, this may be good logic here, but I apprehend gentlemen will find it bad logic on the stump before their constituents. But, sir, the truth is it would not take an unreasonable amount of time. There is too much special legislation here. It is bad enough in the State Legislatures, but it is worse here. Let us pass general laws providing remedies for claimants, and let them resort to the Departments and bureaus and courts, and bring their cases within those laws. If they cannot, then let their claims fall, as they ought to, and not come here to get their claims through where we have not the time to investigate the proof, and where they frequently pass as a sort of favoritism.

Mr. Chairman, this is all wrong, in my judgment. Why, sir, there are now over two thousand private bills for pensions before this Congress already; and God knows how many more will be offered, for they come in by hundreds every bill day; yet we have a pension bureau and laws designating who are entitled to pensions, and under what circumstances. If the general laws granting pensions are insufficient, let us change them and enlarge the grounds for pensions, but not sit here as a great pension bureau instead of attending to general legislation for the public good. If these views were carried out we would not have so many bills appropriating money. I have made these remarks in no partisan spirit, and, sir, I appeal to gentlemen to support the amendment or offer a better one. Let the people know who it is that votes away the money. No man will shrink from it when it is a just appropriation, and if it is not the people have the right to know who voted for it. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is adopted it will save millions of dollars. It has done it in the States and it will do it here. I hope the amendment will prevail. I am not afraid to put myself on the record on such bills. Special legislation and private bills are a curse in the State Legislatures and they are a curse here.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. OSCAR TURNER; and upon a division there were—ayes 103, noes 19.

No further count being called for, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I give notice that I will call for a vote by yeas and nays upon this amendment in the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. You have that right.

The Clerk read the following of Rule XXII:

Rule XXII. Of petitions and memorials—

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the proposed revision of the rules reported from the Committee on Rules, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows: To Mr. WISE, for five days, on account of important business; and To Mr. HOUK, until Wednesday next, on account of sickness and important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHITE. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask my colleague [Mr. WHITE] to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. WHITE. I am willing to do so.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 20, 1880.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, relating to the Des Moines River lands; which will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the memorial be read at length, it being from a State Legislature.

The memorial was read, as follows:

Whereas by an act of Congress of August 8, 1846, a grant of land was made to the then Territory of Iowa, to aid in the improvement of the navigation of the Des Moines River, from its mouth to the Racoon Fork; and

Whereas on the 9th day of June, 1854, the State of Iowa contracted with a corporation known as the Des Moines Navigation and Railroad Company to complete the work then begun by the State as provided by said grant, and to be done for the lands granted thereby, without liability of the State; and

Whereas the State, in 1858, for the purpose of a settlement with said corporation, made a deed to the said company of what title the State then had to certain lands therein described north of the Racoon Fork; and

Whereas by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States at the December term, 1859, between the Dubuque and Sioux City Railroad Company and Edwin C. Litchfield, it was decided that said grant did not extend above the Racoon Fork, and that the certificates issued by the Land Department to the State for said lands were void, and that the said company had no title whatever to the lands claimed by them above said Racoon Fork; and

Whereas by the joint resolution of Congress of March 2, 1861, all the remaining interest in said lands above said Racoon Fork so erroneously certified was released to the bona fide holders of the patents of the State, and by the act of Congress of July 12, 1862, said grant of 1846 was extended so as to include the odd-numbered sections lying within five miles of said river between the Racoon Fork and the north line of the State of Iowa; and

Whereas numerous settlers entered upon the said lands lying north of the Racoon Fork at various times, some of them as early as 1854, believing them to be Government lands open to settlement under the pre-emption and homestead laws of the United States, and have made valuable improvements thereon with a view to ultimate perfection of their title, many of whom have long held possession from the United States under said laws; and

Whereas the Secretary of the Interior, Hon. O. H. Browning, on the 9th day of May, 1868, in an opinion carefully reviewing the acts of 1846, 1861, and 1862, and what is known as the Harvey settlement of 1866 under them; also, the contradictory opinions of the various officials upon the original grant of 1846 and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and particularly that known as the Wolcott case, decided that the said lands heretofore improperly certified, north of the Racoon Fork, were open to pre-emption and settlement under the laws of the United States; and

Whereas in pursuance of such opinion and decisions, and encouraged thereto by such authority and the advice of eminent counsel, several hundreds of said settlers proceeded to file their declarations, and undertook in good faith to perfect their titles to the lands selected and improved by them, as mentioned, and many of said settlers had prior to that time so filed their declarations and applied to pre-empt said land and make homestead entries thereon; and

Whereas grievous litigation is now pending in the various courts of the State and of the United States relating to the title to said lands, improvements thereon, &c.; and

Whereas, on account of the very great hardship that has been brought about by the conflicting decisions aforesaid, great disturbance and trouble has already arisen and is likely to arise unless some satisfactory and just action be taken by the State and General Government relating to this subject; and

Whereas the settlers aforesaid are wholly without remedy under the effect of said rulings of the various Departments and officers of the General Government and courts, and they only desire that the United States should take proper action to protect them, and it has become a matter of vital importance to all the settlers on these lands, whether holding under the United States laws as pre-emptors, or under the company, as well as to all other people residing along the Des Moines Valley from the Racoon Fork to the north line of 92 on the east side, and the north line of 88 on the west side of the river, to which point said lands were certified, that these long-continued and vexing controversies connected with the legislation referred to be fully and finally settled; and

Whereas the settlers upon said lands believe that no action has ever been taken relating to these lands in which the United States and the interest of the United States have been fairly and properly represented in court and only desire that this may be done: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives of the State of Iowa, (the senate concurring.) That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to favor the immediate passage of a bill which shall in some manner provide for the Attorney-General of the United States to immediately commence proceedings or cause such proceedings to be instituted by suit, either in law or in equity, or both, as may be necessary, and appear in the name of the United States so as to remove all clouds from the title to said lands, in which suits any person or persons in possession of, or claiming title to, any tract or tracts of land under the United States involved in such suits may, at his or their expense, unite with the United States in the prosecution of such suits to the end that the title, or titles, of any person, or persons, claiming said lands, may be forever settled.

Approved February 16, 1880.

Mr. ALLISON. I present a memorial of the Legislature of Iowa, relating to another subject, which I ask to have read at length and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Memorial and joint resolution in reference to remitting and abating the internal-revenue legacy tax.

Whereas the General Government in the year 1864 passed a law requiring the payment of a 1 per cent. revenue tax on all legacies thereafter due; and

Whereas that, during the time that said law was in force, a great many estates have been settled up by administrators, guardians, and others, who were liable for said tax without any knowledge of the existence of such a law; and

Whereas the said tax that is now claimed to be due is from parties scattered over the entire country, north, south, east, and west, many of whom are dead, or if living unable to pay the same; and

Whereas the expense attending the collection of this tax, scattered as it is in small amounts over the country, will leave no margin to the Government, but, if any, it will be so small as to be no compensation for the annoyance, trouble, and expense it gives the people; and

Whereas there is now pending in Congress a bill, the purpose of which is to re-tire said tax, together with all penalties due or to become due: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa. That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their influence to secure the passage of said bill, at as early a time as possible, to the end that the people may be saved from unnecessary trouble and expense in litigations that would arise, and that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each of our Representatives.

Approved February 14, 1880.

Mr. BALDWIN presented a memorial of the Chicago Board of Trade, in favor of prompt and adequate appropriations for the completion of the Saint Mary's Ship-Canal, the improvement of the Saint Mary's River, and the deepening of the channel at the Lime Kiln Crossing on the Detroit River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented a petition of E. G. Owen and others, citizens of Bradford County, Pennsylvania, praying such an amendment of the patent laws as will protect innocent users of patented articles from prosecution as infringers; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented the petition of John E. Passmore and 21 others, citizens of Bradford County, Pennsylvania, praying for such legislation as will prevent fluctuations in freights and unjust discriminations in charges for transportation; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PADDOCK. I present the petition of H. M. Ross and 1,500 others, citizens of the State of Nebraska, asking that some action should be had in reference to a subject of most vital concern to a large number of settlers in that State. Indeed I myself consider it a subject of such great importance that I desire to read the petition in full, in order to call the attention of the committee to which it will be referred particularly to the subject in question:

Your petitioners, citizens of Nebraska, respectfully show that some eighteen thousand acres of land, the same having been homesteaded, pre-empted, or purchased between the time the Saint Joseph and Denver City Railroad Company filed their plat in the office of the Secretary of the Interior and the time the local office received notice thereof, along the line of the Saint Joseph and Denver City Railroad, are in litigation on account of the conflict between the grant of lands to such railroad company, and the occupation of the same under the homestead, pre-emption, and other laws; and on account of the decision of Mr. Justice Miller, in the case of Sherman H. Knevals against Judson R. Hyde, in the circuit court of the United States in the district of Nebraska: Holding that the occupants of the land had no right thereto and their patents therefor from the Government should be set aside, even though the railroad company has forfeited the land or obtained other land in its stead; that the effect of this litigation, unless remedied by an act of Congress, will be to deprive hundreds of bona fide homesteaders, pre-emptors, and purchasers for cash, who have patents to their land, of all they possess, their improvements and investments, the fruits of their labor for years, and their homes.

Therefore we respectfully ask our representatives in Congress to procure the passage of an act for the relief of all persons who settled upon lands within the limits of the Saint Joseph and Denver City Railroad grant of land, and acquired patents therefor from the Government, and that such patents be declared to be valid and vest the title in such persons, their heirs and assigns, and that said railroad company, its representatives and assigns, be required to select other lands in place of those so patented, or in lieu thereof be paid the value thereof.

I will state that under the ruling of the Interior Department in respect to these grants to railroad companies the filing of the plat in the office of the Secretary of the Interior is the virtual withdrawal of the lands. In many cases, and particularly in this case, during the interval of time that elapsed between the filing of the plat in the Interior Department and the giving of notice through the local land offices, which was not given for many months, to those who were seeking to purchase or to locate upon the public lands, very many claims were made upon which patents were issued and afterward were canceled, and great suffering therefrom was endured by a large number of citizens, not only in our State but in Kansas. I do not think it was the intention of Congress to cause these lands to be so withdrawn at the Interior Department and yet leave the local land offices without notice thereof, and permit homestead and other locations to be made by consent of the offices, the agents of the Government, and then years afterward, when upon these lands the settlers had expended all they had in improvements thereupon, take their farms from them. Recently I introduced a bill upon this subject which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I move that the petition take the same reference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY presented a petition of the officers and members of the Tobacco Board of Trade of Nashville, Tennessee, relative to the sale of tobacco in foreign countries, praying, inasmuch as the markets of the United States are open to the citizens of all other countries for the importation of tobacco, that such legislation be had as will require them to open their markets and do away with monopolies relative to tobacco produced in the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WINDOM presented the petition of George D. Wilcox and others, citizens of Renville County, Minnesota, praying such an amendment of the patent laws as will protect parties from the threats of patentees or owners of patented articles, or from the speculations of impostors, and to make the manufacturer or vendor of all such articles alone responsible for the infringement; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented the petition of S. Burch and others, citizens of Renville County, Minnesota, praying for such legislation as will prevent fluctuations in freights and unjust discriminations in charges for transportation; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ALLISON presented a resolution of the Board of Trade of Burlington, Iowa, relating to the improvement of the Mississippi River in connection with the act of Congress passed March 3, 1875, "for the further security of navigation on the Mississippi River," which authorizes the Secretary of War to inquire into the expediency of causing sheer-booms to be placed on the upper end of all or any bridge piers on that river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a petition of James B. Shores and 34 others, citizens of Howard County, Missouri, favoring the passage of a law for the regulation of interstate commerce. They complain, as the producing classes of the country, that corporate monopolies "exercise and abuse their power by discriminating unjustly between individuals and localities, building up or destroying at will, and, to use the words of a United States Senate committee, 'recognize no responsibility' but to their stockholders, and no principle of action but personal and corporate aggrandizement." They recommend the passage of the Reagan interstate-commerce bill or some similar measure. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KELLOGG presented the petition of Jack Lecomte, of Natchitoches, Louisiana, praying the passage of a law allowing him compensation for beef-cattle furnished the United States Army in the year 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 1349) for enlarging the City Hall for the accommodation of the courts and records of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1316) making an appropriation for the erection of a light-house and fog-bell on Whale Rock, at the entrance of Narragansett Bay, reported it without amendment.

RESUMPTION AND FUNDING.

Mr. FERRY. The Committee on Printing yesterday reported back adversely a resolution to print 5,000 extra copies of Executive Document No. 7, Forty-sixth Congress, being a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting letters and documents pertaining to resumption and funding, and the resolution was indefinitely postponed. I ask that that order be reconsidered and the resolution placed on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered, no objection being made.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WINDOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1347) for the relief of E. Parlman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1348) for the relief of James D. Wood; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BOOTH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1350) for the relief of C. N. Felton, late assistant treasurer of the United States at San Francisco, California; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BUTLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 83) for the restoration of the books of the Beaufort Library, of South Carolina; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Library.

WILLIAM ENGLISH.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the call of the Calendar under the standing order of the day, commencing at the point reached yesterday.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 332) authorizing the appointment of William English to a second lieutenantancy in the Army.

Mr. BURNSIDE. This gentleman has already been appointed to the Army, and been confirmed by the Senate, I do not know exactly according to what law. It seems that the action of the Senate on this bill is unnecessary in the case. I therefore move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

FORT LEAVENWORTH RESERVATION.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 159) to provide for the sale of certain portions of the Fort Leavenworth military reservation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that might go over. It is to sell land to a railroad company.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

JOHN CUTLER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 942) releasing the title of the United States to a certain parcel of land to the assigns of John Cutler; which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, in line 8, to strike out "assignees" and insert "assigns;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the title of the United States to that parcel of land, containing thirty-eight and thirty-one hundredths acres, lying near Visalia, in the county of Tulare, State of California, which was conveyed to the United States by John Cutler, on the 2d of October, 1865, is hereby released to the assigns of said John Cutler.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is no report.

Mr. BOOTH. This bill passed the Senate at the last Congress without a division. I will state the circumstances under which this relief is asked.

In 1865 a company of troops was ordered to the vicinity of Visalia for some purpose that I do not now remember. The citizens of that place subscribed $300, and bought about forty acres of land for an encampment. Mr. Cutler was the owner of the land, and he executed an instrument which he supposed conveyed to the United States a right to the free use of this land for military purposes. The troops were there less than ten days, and made no improvements; they were simply encamped there, and after they left, three years afterward, Mr. Cutler, supposing he had a right, sold the land and reimbursed the men who had subscribed to buy it for the use of the United States. The instrument that he executed to the United States has been construed to be a deed, so that the purchaser under him takes no title. There are only forty acres, and there are no improvements on it. I hope that the bill will be passed. I have an abstract of the title before me. The land has passed into other hands since Mr. Cutler sold it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did this gentleman, Mr. Cutler, sell by a warranty deed or a quitclaim?

Mr. BOOTH. I think by a quitclaim. The abstract does not show.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it was by a warranty, a release to Cutler would be a little safer for the United States and would inure to the benefit of the assignees; but if it was by quitclaim, then it would not.

Mr. BOOTH. I have no objection to any amendment the Senator may suggest.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it would be safer for all the parties, and for the United States in particular, to say "to said John Cutler and his assigns," so that it would be left as a matter between them to be settled.

Mr. BOOTH. I accept that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont will be considered as agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill releasing the title of the United States in a certain parcel of land to John Cutler and his assigns."

SURETIES OF HENRY L. NORVELL.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1004) for the relief of the sureties of Henry L. Norvell; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. WALLACE January 13, 1880:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of Lamsford B. Yondell and others, sureties on the bond of Henry L. Norvell, late collector of internal revenue for the second district of Tennessee, praying to be relieved from liabilities as such sureties, respectfully report:

That Henry L. Norvell was appointed collector for the old second district of Tennessee on March 26, 1864, and gave bond in $100,000, with Woods, Elliston, Claiborne, and Castleman as sureties. This district included some thirty counties of Middle Tennessee. Norvell filled this office until June 30, 1866, when the district was subdivided and Norvell appointed collector of the fifth district. He gave a new bond for that position and held the office until the expiration of his term, and has settled with the Government for all moneys due it for the said last term.

On June 1, 1876, the Government brought suit upon the bond given for the old second district, and claimed a balance of $95,442.32. Norvell, the collector, died in 1874, Elliston in 1870, Woods in 1875, and Claiborne in 1876. The executors of the sureties and of Norvell were sued. All of the parties are insolvent save the estate of Elliston, whose heirs are the petitioners.

When the old second district was subdivided, Norvell was required to certify to the new collectors the balances uncollected. This was done, but he was not credited with these amounts save as portions thereof were collected. The whole balance now claimed from the sureties of Norvell is $42,593.79. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue advises your committee that it is believed that the larger portion of this balance represents uncollected taxes which probably could have been abated as uncollectible if proper evidence had been presented to the office at the time, but that it is now impossible to perfect such evidence as will enable the sureties of Collector Norvell to obtain credit according to law and regulations of the Department.

It appears that during the proper time for the collection of these taxes it was impossible for the collector to reach the locality, owing to the occupation of the largest part of the district by the forces of the enemy, and that these taxes never were in fact collected or received by the collector, Norvell.

Under these circumstances, and in view of the great lapse of time from the date of the bond to the bringing of the suit by the Government, your committee report that the prayer of the petitioner should be granted, and report to the Senate herewith a bill for that purpose.

Mr. BAILEY. I move to amend the bill in line 8 by striking out "1861" and inserting "1864," so as to read, "upon a bond executed in the year 1864." There is evidently a mistake as to the date.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that the same bond referred to in the report?

Mr. BAILEY. That is the bond referred to. Mr. Norvell was appointed in 1864.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a misdescription?

Mr. BAILEY. A misdescription.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Tennessee will be made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to say about this report and this bill that I fear there is a good deal of danger in the bill as a precedent. It may be right in this particular case; but to discharge sureties, on the ground that there has been a considerable lapse of time, from the payment of their obligations, if applied to all the districts of the United States I think would be a great mistake. But I have found out by experience that it is not a very prosperous occupation to resist reports of this character upon general principles, and so merely expressing my opposition to the principle embodied in this case, in a large part of it, if it will do any good, I leave it.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to say that the circumstances in this case are a little peculiar. The only solvent name now remaining upon the bond is the estate of William R. Elliston. Mr. Elliston died in 1870, more than six years before an action was brought upon the bond, and after his estate had been distributed among his heirs. The other parties upon the bond were solvent. It is stated in the memorial that the aggregate wealth of the sureties upon the bond in the year 1866, when the liability was incurred, if any at all, exceeded $1,000,000, whereas all of them have become insolvent save alone the estate of William R. Elliston, and all the sureties are dead save two.

There is another fact which is not referred to in the report. Mr. Norvell was the collector for that district in Tennessee during its occupation by military forces upon either side; he was collector at the time of the battle of Nashville; and it was utterly impossible for him to collect the taxes due to the Internal Revenue Department in the manner prescribed by law. He executed a new bond in 1866. He settled all his liabilities under that bond; but the Government still waited, and no demand was made of him or his sureties until after he was dead, after all the sureties but two were dead, and when it is utterly impossible to show whether there is in law or in equity any responsibility upon the part of the sureties.

This is an extraordinary case. Since I have been in the Senate two or three similar cases have been before the Senate for its consideration, and in every such case the sureties have been relieved. I remember one case from Indiana a year ago; another I believe that came from the State of Missouri or from Kansas—one of the Western States. The Committee on Finance, to which this bill was referred, I understand, reported unanimously in its favor, and there is a recommendation also from the Internal Revenue Commissioner that the sureties in this case shall have the relief they ask.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The report of the committee does not quite state that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or the Secretary of the Treasury recommends the passage of this bill. It states that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue thinks that the larger portion of this balance might have been abated on account, I suppose, of the circumstances named by the Senator from Tennessee, and so far as they relate to the state of military disturbance that existed there, they are certainly entitled to very great weight. If the matter were to rest upon that ground alone, I do not know but that I should be in favor of the bill; but to put it upon the ground that time has elapsed and that some of the sureties are insolvent is equivalent to saying to everybody who goes surety on official bonds that it is no part of his business to see to it that his principal performs the duty that the bond requires him to perform, and that if the Government does not keep constant watch, through the agents that it is obliged to employ, and sue before any change of circumstances occurs, then the equitable liability upon the bond is gone and we are bound to release it. I do not believe in that doctrine. I believe it would be ruinous to the Treasury to adopt any such doctrine.

The United States has to carry on its business by agents whose duties are prescribed by law. The gentlemen who agree to be bondsmen for collectors of internal revenue and other public officers know what the law is, and they know that it is their duty to see to it that their principal pays up the balances that are against him; and it is no laches on the part of the United States, or the part of the people and its Government, if some clerk in the Treasury whose business it is to report these balances to the district attorney or the Solicitor of the Treasury, or whoever it may be, does not do it. The bondsmen know that they are not discharged for any such reason; and as the law now stands it is a stimulus to sureties to see to it that their engagements are kept, and it helps the Government and does not hurt them because they are not bound to be sureties and need not be unless they choose.

But as I say, Mr. President, I have found by experience that it is useless to stand upon any such ground apparently. In part of it certainly I agree with the Senator from Tennessee, and if the case stood upon that ground I think he would be right, that this state of war there made such a condition of things exist that very likely this gentleman did all he could. That is a very strong ground, I think.

Mr. BAILEY. Do not misunderstand me. I do not mean that a state of war existed during the entire period; I did not wish to be so understood, but during a part of the period. Norvell has been dead for many years. His sureties are all dead save two who are insolvent, and their estates have been divided, and in some instances they have been spent. It appears that the whole burden of this obligation would fall upon two or three persons. I will ask leave to read simply the closing paragraph in the letter of Mr. Raum, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue:

There have been some peculiar circumstances connected with this case, differing from any case that has ever come before this office, and I would therefore recommend the prayer of the petitioners to your favorable consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is stronger than the report. It may be a later letter.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SETTLERS ON KANSAS INDIAN LANDS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 619) for the relief of certain settlers on the Kansas trust and diminished-reserve lands in the State of Kansas.

Mr. PADDOCK. As neither of the Kansas Senators is in the Chamber, I ask that the bill be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

JURISDICTION OF SUPREME COURT.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 216) to extend the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This bill is reported from the Committee on the Judiciary adversely. The Senator reporting it [Mr. CARPENTER] is not present.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It had better go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

J. P. ZIMMERMAN AND H. P. SNOW.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2003) for the relief of J. P. Zimmerman and H. P. Snow, of Clinton County, Kentucky; which was considered in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $98 to J. P. Zimmerman and H. P. Snow, citizens of Clinton County, Kentucky, being the amount of a forfeited mail-route bond paid by them.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SURPLUS REVENUE DEPOSITS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 877) to relieve the Treasurer of the United States from the amount now charged to him and deposited with the several States.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That bill had better go over, I think.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

UNITED STATES NOTES AS A LEGAL TENDER.

The next business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (S. R. No. 49) in relation to United States Treasury notes.

Mr. PENDLETON. Let that go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

DUTIABLE MAIL MATTER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 843) providing for the delivery of dutiable articles in the mails and for indemnity for lost registered articles; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It declares that the provisions of section 17 of the act of March 3, 1879, "making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes," authorizing the delivery of dutiable books to addresses in the United States under such regulations for the collection of customs duties as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster-General, shall be applicable to and embrace all articles of dutiable matter received by mail from foreign countries. It also provides that the Postmaster-General may accept and carry into execution the provisions of article 6 of the universal postal union convention concluded at Paris June 1, 1878, respecting the payment of an indemnity of fifty francs in case of the loss of a registered article exchanged by mail with countries of the universal postal union.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads with amendments, which were, in section 1, line 11, after the word "all," to insert the word "mailable," and in line 13, after the word "countries," to insert "and admissible by the convention for the formation of a universal postal union, ratified by the President of the United States on the 13th of August, 1878;" so as to make the last clause of the first section read:

Shall be applicable to and embrace all available articles of dutiable matter received by mail from foreign countries and admissible by the convention for the formation of a universal postal union, ratified by the President of the United States on the 13th of August, 1878.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEPUTY COLLECTOR AT LAKE CHARLES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2785) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint a deputy collector at Lake Charles, Louisiana; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTEROCEANIC CANAL.

The next business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (S. R. No. 66) in relation to an interoceanic canal.

Mr. PLATT. I move the reference of that resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FERRY. I call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to the fact that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] who takes an interest in this question is not present. I see the Senator from Georgia is now present, and I call his attention to the motion just made.

Mr. PLATT. I thought at the time I introduced this resolution that it was a resolution which was properly referable to the Committee on Foreign Relations; but inasmuch as the question of raising a select committee was then pending, before the Senate and I thought it would be disposed of in a day or two, I asked that the resolution lie on the table. This resolution relates particularly to the action which foreign powers may be requested to take upon this matter; and inasmuch as there seems to be no present prospect of settling the question of raising a select committee, I think it may be as well referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. If a select committee shall be appointed, the Committee on Foreign Relations can report it back and have it referred to the special committee.

Mr. GORDON. May I hear the resolution read? If it is very long I shall not ask it.

Mr. PLATT. It is short.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Joint resolution in relation to an interoceanic canal.

Whereas an improved and cheaper maritime communication between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboard of the United States, by means of a ship-canal through some portion of the Central American isthmus, has become important to the commercial interests of this country; and

Whereas Congress deems it to be necessary and expedient that the national and public interests in such a communication should be secured rather than merely private and speculative ends: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be requested, if he shall deem it expedient, to communicate to the governments of the principal maritime nations of Europe the desire of this Government to secure such public interests, and to invite the co-operation of such governments in the selection of a route of isthmus ship transit which shall be found to subserve most largely the general interests of all the maritime nations; and also to communicate to such governments the desire of this Government to come to a mutual understanding with reference to the neutrality of such an interoceanic transit when it shall have been opened by the enterprise and capital of their respective citizens.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I do not rise to antagonize the motion but more to suggest to the Senator that inasmuch as the question has not been decided as to whether the Senate will organize a select committee on this subject, it would be better probably to let it lie until that question is decided. It certainly will be decided in the next few days.

Mr. PLATT. Of course an objection takes it over under the rule, but I have waited a very long time for the matter of a select committee to be decided, and while we may think it is going to be decided quickly, it may not be. I should very much prefer that the resolution be referred at the present time to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Georgia to object?

Mr. GORDON. I do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1060) to incorporate the Interoceanic Transit Company, and for other purposes.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that be passed over. My colleague who introduced it is not in.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

WAGON-ROAD TO SIOUX RESERVATION.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 754) to authorize the relocation and improvement of the military wagon-road from Sidney, Nebraska, via Forts Robinson and Sheridan, to the Sioux Indian reservation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is reported adversely.

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask that it be passed over. Another bill involving the same purpose is before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next bill will be reported.

JAMES A. BARR.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 50) for the relief of James A. Barr.

Mr. PLATT. In the absence of the Senator who reported the bill, without an explanation I shall object. If there is any member of the Military Committee who can make an explanation I shall be willing to listen to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is objected to.

Mr. PLATT. I do not object if there is any member of the Military Committee present who can explain the bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Perhaps the report had better be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. PLUMB on the 21st of January:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 50) for the relief of James A. Barr, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report:

That the facts and equities of the case presented by the claimant for relief cannot be in doubt. He entered the service as a private in Company H, Twenty-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and served faithfully with that regiment until near the close of the war, or until the winter of 1864-'65. He was appointed a second lieutenant of said company and regiment, April 15, 1863, and on the 22d of the same month entered upon the duties of that position. He was mustered with the company and paid on the company rolls. Owing to the interruption of communication his commission from the governor of Ohio never reached him. He was subsequently promoted to be first lieutenant and regimental quartermaster, and was mustered to date from December 1, 1862. He could not then be regularly mustered into the rank of second lieutenant to cover the period during which he actually served in that capacity, because, as has already been stated, his commission had been lost. On a final settlement of his accounts with the Treasury Department he was charged with the amount so paid to him as second lieutenant by virtue of his service, but without a commission. The committee believe that he was entitled to his pay, that the failure to muster properly was through no fault of his, and that he ought to be paid the sum withheld from him on account of this item charged against him. A bill substantially the same as the one under consideration passed the Senate in the last Congress, and received, as we are informed, the approval of the Military Committee of the House, which committee, however, had no opportunity to report it.

The committee, therefore, recommend the passage of the bill without amendment.

Mr. PLATT. The objection is withdrawn.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM W. ROSS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 707) for the relief of William W. Ross; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to William W. Ross, of Sparta, Oregon, of $56.63, being the amount of funds in his possession as postmaster belonging to the Post-Office Department, and destroyed by fire July 30, 1874, without his fault.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADVANCEMENT OF NAVY AND MARINE OFFICERS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 593) to repeal the provision authorizing the advancement of an officer of the Navy thirty numbers in rank for extraordinary heroism; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to make an amendment for which I am indebted to the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs; after the word "six," in line 3, insert "and 1605," and in the fourth line the word "are" instead of "is;" so as to read: "That sections 1506 and 1605 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let an explanation be made.

Mr. HARRIS. Let those sections of the Revised Statutes be read.

Mr. ANTHONY. This is a bill to repeal the provisions which authorize the advancement of officers of the Navy and the Marine Corps thirty numbers for extraordinary heroism, an act that was passed during the war, but the time has passed for any such advancement now.

Mr. HARRIS. It proposes to repeal certain sections of the Revised Statutes, and I suppose we had better have those sections read so that we may know what we are repealing.

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The sections will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1506. Any officer of the Navy may, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, be advanced, not exceeding thirty numbers in rank, for eminent and conspicuous conduct in battle or extraordinary heroism.

SEC. 1605. Any officer of the Marine Corps may, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, be advanced not exceeding thirty numbers in rank, for eminent and conspicuous conduct in battle or extraordinary heroism.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ANTHONY. The title should be amended so as to read: "A bill to repeal the provisions authorizing the advancement of an officer of the Navy or Marine Corps thirty numbers in rank for extraordinary heroism."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The title will be so amended.

JOHN DOLAN.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 556) to authorize the President to appoint Sergeant John Dolan, of the Fifth Cavalry, United States Army, a second lieutenant, and place him upon the retired list.

Mr. COCKRELL. In connection with that bill I desire a telegram to be read that I send to the desk, which will show that that bill is an act of supererogation.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, February 11, 1880.

[From the War Department to Senator COCKRELL, United States Senate.]

First Sergeant John Dolan, Company F, Fifth Cavalry, was killed September 29, 1879, in action with hostile Indians at Milk River, Colorado.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senate is so fond of putting back officers of the Army and Navy who have been dismissed, that I do not know that the Senator ought to interpose an objection on account of the man having been killed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be indefinitely postponed, if there be no objection.

PATRICK SULLIVAN.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 426) for the relief of Patrick Sullivan.

Mr. COCKRELL. That bill was called up by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] some time since, and postponed at my suggestion. I suggest to him, in view of the evidence which has been obtained by him, that the bill had probably better be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I do not object to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

JACOB B. KING.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 388) for the relief of Jacob B. King; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Jacob B. King, of Illinois, the pay and allowance of a first lieutenant of infantry, from June 30, 1864, to January 31, 1865, less the pay of a sergeant of infantry.

Mr. WITHERS. Let us hear the report read which justifies this.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. LOGAN on the 21st January:

The bill for the relief of Jacob B. King, late first lieutenant Company C, Eighty-first Regiment Illinois Volunteers, granting him pay and allowances of that rank from June 30, 1864, to January 31, 1865, less the pay of a sergeant of infantry already received, is based upon the following facts:

He was promoted to the office of first lieutenant of Company C, Eighty-first Illinois Infantry Volunteers, and was commissioned as such June 30, 1864; was not mustered until January 31, 1865, at Eastport, Mississippi, owing to the troops being constantly on the march after Price in Missouri and Arkansas, rendering it impossible for him to appear before a mustering officer. Failure to be mustered not being caused by neglect on his part, he is legally and fairly entitled to the relief sought, having discharged his duty as first lieutenant during the time intervening between June 30, 1864, and January 31, 1865, and his company having the requisite organization to authorize his muster-in. The committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN S. CUNNINGHAM.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 286) for the relief of John S. Cunningham; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to place to the credit of John Scott Cunningham $1,284.19, being the amount embezzled by his late clerk while at the San Francisco Navy pay office.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. ANTHONY January 21:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 286) for the relief of John S. Cunningham, a pay director in the Navy, having considered the same, make the following report:

The memorialist is a pay director in the Navy. He has been many years in the service, and has disbursed many millions of dollars, and his accounts, as appears by the certificates of the accounting officers of the Treasury, have been kept with remarkable clearness and accuracy, and have been rendered with unvarying promptness, having been always settled promptly to a cent.

He was stationed at the Navy pay office, San Francisco, California, where he made it a rule not to permit any money to be drawn from the Treasury for the use of his office, but paid every bill, however small in amount, by check on the sub-treasury. He had invented a system of recording a history of bills and payments in a book, which is highly commended by the Fourth Auditor as a security against fraud. He was accustomed to draw his checks payable to order, but the assistant treasurer at San Francisco refused payment of them, and required him to make them payable to bearer. In accordance with this requirement he drew three checks, one for $720, to pay a bill of the California Cracker Company; one for $361.72, to pay a bill of Whittier, Fuller & Co.; and one for $202.47, to pay a bill of James E. Jordan; in all, $1,284.19, which were intrusted to Franklin Philp, his clerk, a sworn officer, approved by the Navy Department, and who embezzled them and applied the proceeds to his own use. Immediately on discovering the embezzlement Captain Cunningham deposited of his own funds the amount of the checks in the United States Treasury, and obtained therefor transfer drafts on San Francisco, which he at once forwarded to the parties for whom the embezzled checks were intended. The clerk absconded, and is wholly irresponsible.

Whatever are the objections to indemnifying disbursing officers for losses inflicted upon them by their subordinates, they can hardly apply when the loss is occasioned by a compulsory mode of drawing the checks against which the officer protested, and when, if he had been permitted to draw them in the mode which he attempted for the greater security of the Government, the loss would not have occurred. It appears that the loss was caused by no fault or neglect of the memorialist, but by the requirement of the Treasury officers that the check should be made payable to bearer.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETER PHILLIPS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 389) for the relief of Peter Phillips; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Peter Phillips, of Illinois, of the pay and allowance of a first lieutenant of cavalry from October 14, 1863, to March 9, 1864, less the pay of a sergeant of cavalry, which was received by him for that time.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE V. HEBB.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 180) for the relief of George V. Hebb; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to audit the claim of George V. Hebb, late captain and assistant quartermaster in Mexico, for any balance of pay that may be found due him as an officer, and to pay the amount due in full settlement of the same, not to exceed the sum of $136.50.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARK WALKER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 2) for the relief of Mark Walker; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to suspend the provisions of law regulating appointments in the Army so far as they affect Mark Walker, late first lieutenant Nineteenth United States Infantry, and to authorize the President, if he so desire, in the exercise of his own discretion and judgment, to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint Mark Walker to the same grade and rank of first lieutenant held by him on May 13, 1878; and he is thereupon to be placed upon the retired list of the Army, provided the same shall be recommended by the retiring board.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill with an amendment to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the acceptance of the provisions of this act shall be a waiver of all rights, present and prospective, under the pension laws of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. PLUMB January 21:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2) for the relief of Mark Walker, have had the same under consideration, and make the following report:

That the records of the War Department show that Walker entered the military service as a corporal of Company G, Fifteenth Indiana Volunteers, June 14, 1861, was subsequently appointed sergeant, promoted to second lieutenant, January 1, 1863, and to first lieutenant March 1, 1863. He was so severely wounded at the battle of Stone River, December 31, 1862, as to compel his absence from his regiment until March 1, 1863. He rendered faithful service until June 25, 1864, when he was honorably mustered out. He re-entered the service as a captain in the Two hundred and fourteenth Pennsylvania Volunteers, March 30, 1865, and served in the Shenandoah Valley and in this city until January 22, 1866, when mustered out. He was brevetted major of volunteers March 13, 1865, "for gallant and meritorious services during the war." He was subsequently appointed second and first lieutenant of the Nineteenth Infantry, Regular Army, his appointment to both grades dating February 23, 1866, and was brevetted captain March 2, 1867. He continued in the service until April 29, 1878, when he was dismissed, pursuant to the findings of a general court-martial, "for drunkenness on duty, in violation of the thirty-eighth article of war," to take effect May 13, 1878.

The specification of the charge on which Lieutenant Walker was tried is—

"In that First Lieutenant Mark Walker, Nineteenth Infantry, being on duty in command of his company at undress parade at retreat, at Fort Lyon, Colorado, on or about December 24, 1877, was found drunk."

To the charge and specification Lieutenant Walker pleaded guilty.

The occurrence on which the charge was based happened on Christmas eve, an occasion on which the tendency to conviviality in social intercourse, and notably in Army intercourse on the frontier, though not excusable, is certainly far too general. The "duty" upon which the accused was found in an intoxicated condition, while falling within the prohibition of the article of war, was evidently not of that character which involves the highest degree of responsibility on the part of the officer. The record shows that Lieutenant Walker, during his service of sixteen years, had never before been accused of any misconduct.

It is abundantly shown, as well by the records of the War Department, setting forth frequent absences on sick leave, as by the concurrent testimony of brother officers and the certificates of Army surgeons, that, at the time of the commission of the offense, Lieutenant Walker was, and for several years had been, suffering from a complication of diseases, which for long periods had rendered him wholly unfit for active service.

While the charge upon which he was dismissed was pending, he applied to be ordered before a retiring board with a view to retirement for disability, but the application was suspended to await the result of the trial. In support of this application the post surgeon at Fort Lyon certified that he had served at the same post with Walker from December, 1874, to May, 1875, and again, at Fort Lyon, from July, 1877, to the date of the certificate, December 26, 1877; that Walker had frequently been under medical treatment; that he was suffering from valvular disease of the heart, and subject to frequent attacks of acute rheumatism, and that he was wholly unfit for active service. The surgeon further certified that, in his opinion, Walker would never be fit for such service, and that the diseases mentioned were contracted in the service. Prior to the commission of said offense, namely, on November 8, 1877, the colonel of his regiment had recommended that he "be ordered before a retiring board for examination, with a view to his being retired from the service."

In submitting the case to the Secretary of War for the action of the President, the Judge-Advocate-General of the Army commented upon the record as follows: "In view of the conviviality so frequent at the season when the accused committed the offense for which he has been brought to trial, and of the informal character of the duty upon which he was engaged, his misconduct, it is submitted, was much more venial than under ordinary circumstances it would be right or expedient to hold it. The case appears to be one in which considerable clemency may well be exercised; the more clearly so when the accused's ill health, apparently the result of wounds and severe service, and his honorable record, are taken into consideration."

General Pennypacker, the president of the court-martial, writes to the Adjutant-General of the Army, under date of March 9, 1879, recommending that Walker be restored and placed on the retired list. He says:

"I considered, at the time of his trial, that his was a very hard case; that he was undoubtedly afflicted very much from exposure incident to the service. Yet, as he pleaded guilty, there was nothing for the court to do but the action taken by them. The circumstances surrounding the case, the time at which the admitted offense was committed, the physical condition of the accused, all tend to induce me to make this recommendation as an act of justice to Mr. Walker."

The passage of a bill identical with the one now under consideration was recommended by the Secretary of War during the last Congress, and it was reported favorably by this committee, with certain amendments, which we have again adopted, and with such amendments recommend its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KANSAS MILITARY EXPENSES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 80) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain and report to Congress the amount of money expended and indebtedness assumed by the State of Kansas in repelling invasions and suppressing Indian hostilities.

Mr. ROLLINS. Neither of the Senators from Kansas is present. Let that bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

JOHN W. CHICKERING.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 131) for the relief of John W. Chickering; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 11, after the word "purpose," to insert—

Provided, He shall be appointed only when a vacancy happens in that grade: And provided—

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be now read as it is amended.

The Chief Clerk read the bill as amended, as follows:

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint John W. Chickering, late first lieutenant Sixth United States Cavalry, a first lieutenant of cavalry in the Army of the United States, with the same rank and date of commission held by him prior to the 27th day of January, 1875; and the law of promotion in the line is hereby suspended in this case for this purpose: Provided, He shall be appointed only when a vacancy happens in that grade: And provided, That nothing shall be paid to him for the interval of time between the 27th day of January, 1875, and the date of appointment under this act.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask for the reading of the report or an explanation of the facts.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report is quite lengthy. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] reported the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I have reported so many of these bills that while I remember the case I cannot remember specifically the reasons for the recommendation; hence the report will have to be read.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator will remember that the committee came to the conclusion that the charge against this officer was a mistake. Mr. LOGAN. The reason is set out in full in the report.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

DUNBAR B. RANSOM.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 390) to authorize the President to restore Dunbar B. Ransom to his rank in the Army.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I object to the consideration of that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

FORT LARNED MILITARY RESERVATION.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 193) to provide for the disposition of the Fort Larned military reservation.

Mr. ALLISON. Let that be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

FORT HARKER MILITARY RESERVATION.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 194) to provide for the disposal of the Fort Harker military reservation.

Mr. WITHERS. Let that go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

NAVAL HISTORY OF THE WAR.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 888) to authorize the compilation and printing of the naval history of the war; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, after the word "order," in line 17, to strike out:

And for the said publication the sum of ——— dollars is hereby appropriated, which shall be available from and after the passage of this act, and where extra services are performed after office hours, and in addition to other regular duties, by the clerks employed upon this work, they shall be paid such reasonable extra compensation therefor as the Secretary of the Navy may determine.

And insert:

And for the purpose of such publication, the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to employ three additional clerks, one at a salary of $1,200, and two at a salary of $1,000 each per annum; and the sum of $1,500, or as much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the same for the current fiscal year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the Senator from Rhode Island, who reported the bill, why he confines the selection to a line officer of the Navy.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to that limitation being stricken out. Say "an officer of the Navy," so as to give the Secretary the whole corps to select from.

Mr. ALLISON. Let him have the whole range of the Navy.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that is an improvement.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to strike out the words "a line," before the word "officer," in line 4, and insert "an;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Navy be authorized to detail an officer of the Navy to compile, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LE VERT & MASTEN.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1088) for the relief of Claude H. Masten, surviving partner of the firm of Le Vert & Masten, of Mobile, Alabama, and the children of Octavia Le Vert, deceased; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $1,200 to Claude H. Masten, as surviving partner of Le Vert & Masten, one-half for the use and benefit of the surviving child or children of Octavia Le Vert, deceased, the other half for the use and benefit of Masten; this sum to be received in full payment and satisfaction for the rent of the Le Vert hospital by the United States authorities.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUITS BY AND AGAINST CORPORATIONS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1089) to amend section 640 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the removal of suits by corporations, and to make further provision relating to suits by and against corporations.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Let that bill go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

SOLOMON MORRIS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1100) for the relief of Solomon Morris; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Solomon Morris of Company A, Thirty-eighth Illinois Infantry Volunteers, of the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant of infantry from the 30th of July, 1863, to the 7th of February, 1865, deducting the pay he received as sergeant of infantry.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. LOGAN January 21:

That the bill for the relief of Solomon Morris, late sergeant Company A, Thirty-eighth Illinois Volunteers, for pay and allowances as second lieutenant of said company and regiment, is based upon the facts as follows:

Your committee have carefully considered the evidence and find that the claims of said Solomon Morris, for pay and allowances from July 30, 1863, less the pay of a sergeant already received to the date of his muster-out, March, 1865, is based upon equitable grounds, he having performed the duties of second lieutenant to the date of his capture at the battle of Chickamauga, September 20, 1863. He was not permitted to go to a mustering officer on account of the Army being under orders. The failure to be mustered was not caused by any neglect or omission on his part. He is fairly and legally entitled to the relief sought by the bill, and the committee therefore recommend its passage.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object to the passage of this bill, but I would suggest to the Military Committee the propriety of passing some general bill applying to all officers in the situation this officer is. This I think is the third bill this morning we have passed relieving lieutenants and other officers because of a failure to muster. I know that there are quite a number of officers similarly situated in my own State, and some years ago I endeavored to secure relief for one or two of them, but not being on the Military Committee I did not hear of the cases afterward. But I think justice to these officers, from whatever State they may come, requires that a general bill be passed making provision for them on sufficient proof being furnished to the military authorities.

Mr. MAXEY. The Committee on Military Affairs would be very much gratified to pass such a bill, because it would relieve the committee from a great deal of labor; but the fact is that every case from its very nature stands on its own bottom. We reject a great many of these claims; and I believe more advantage would be taken of the Government under a general bill than there can be where each case is carefully examined by the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. The merits of each case of course depend upon the fact whether the failure to muster was on account of some act on the part of the Government or on account of some act of the officer himself. It seems to me that discretion could be lodged very well with the Secretary of War where he is satisfied that a failure to muster was caused not by the act of the officer but by some casualty or some circumstances not the fault of the officer, to allow the error to be corrected.

Mr. MAXEY. As the regulations now stand, and I believe the law, an officer cannot be paid except from the date of his muster, and yet it happens just as in the case we have just passed that the officer who had been promoted was in the field and could not be spared from the field to be mustered, not by reason of any negligence of his but because he was doing his duty. In a case like that, I think it is equity to override the regulations and say the man shall get his pay. But in any case whatever if the officer failed of muster by his own laches, by his own negligence, or if from any cause he does not show a paramount equity in his favor, we reject the claim. I have no objection to a general law, but I do not think it would be as safe as a careful examination of each case.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The extended morning hour has expired, and the Senate proceeds to the consideration of its unfinished business.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask unanimous consent that the morning hour be extended half an hour longer for the consideration of the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana asks the Senate to consider the Calendar until two o'clock. The Chair hears no objection. The Secretary will proceed with the call of the Calendar.

MONROE DONOHO.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 996) for the relief of Monroe Donoho; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Monroe Donoho, late register of the United States land office at Tuscaloosa, Alabama, of $169.45.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear the report in that case. The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. GROOME January 22:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 996) for the relief of Monroe Donoho, and certain papers relating thereto, have considered the same, and report:

That a like bill was referred to the Committee on Claims in the last Senate, who made the following report thereon:

"The claimant was register of the United States land office at Tuscaloosa, in the State of Alabama, until the 28th February, 1861, and it appears from an account stated by J. A. Williamson, Commissioner of Public Lands, on the 3d day of May, 1877, that the Government was indebted to the claimant on account of salary and commissions in the sum of $169.45, which amount the Commissioner recommends be paid to him.

"The committee report the bill back with the recommendation that it pass."

This committee, after a careful re-examination of the case, adopt that report as their own.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES H. NICHOLLS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 523) for the relief of Charles H. Nicholls, late superintendent of the Government Hospital for the Insane.

Mr. CONKLING. From what committee does the bill come?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that bill be passed over.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask that it be not passed over, and nobody here, I think, will object to it when I make a statement.

Dr. Nicholls's salary was fixed by law in 1855 at $2,500 a year as superintendent of the Government Hospital for the Insane. Years afterward—the exact date I have forgotten—his salary was fixed at $4,000. He drew pay according to that act. After a while the work of revision was going on, and we have one of the beauties of the revised code in this instance. The revised code adopted at the first session of the Forty-third Congress, in 1873-74, went back to the first act, and in revising the laws revived the repealed law of 1855, ignoring the act which gave him $4,000, and placed him upon the salary of $2,500 a year. It was not the intention at all, but it was one of the blunders for which the revised code under my hand is very remarkable. Dr. Nicholls, in entire ignorance of the blunder that had been made in this revision, made out his accounts as before, and the officers of the Treasury, likewise in ignorance of it, proceeded to pay him according to the last act, $4,000 a year for two years. As soon as they found out this blunder of the revisers, of course they ceased to pay the salary at that rate, and went back to the rate of $2,500 a year. This bill is for the purpose of settling his accounts without charging him with the excess which he drew during this interval. It was prepared at the Treasury Department upon my request in order to settle his accounts upon a basis of justice. It provides that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they hereby are, authorized and directed to pass to the credit of Charles H. Nicholls, late superintendent of the Government Hospital for the Insane, the sum of $3,037.09, that being the amount disallowed in his accounts, and being the difference in salary between $2,500 and $4,000 per annum from June 22, 1874, to June 30, 1876; said disallowance having been made to conform to the requirements of the Revised Statutes, section 4839, adopted June 22, 1874; and the salary of the said superintendent is hereby fixed at $4,000 per annum, as originally provided in act of March 2, 1867.

The whole thing is of very easy comprehension, and it is no fault of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

In answer to the inquiry of the Senator from New York, I will state that this bill was introduced by me at the extra session of Congress, and it was referred to the Committee on Finance, of which I am a member. When it came up for consideration before that committee at the present session, it was thought by some members of the committee that it was not germane to the business of the Finance Committee, but that it was germane to the business of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. It was thereupon transferred in the proper way to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, of which the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE,] who is not now in his seat, is chairman, and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] and the Senator from New York to my right [Mr. KERNAN] are members, and others whom I do not now recall. It is here upon a unanimous report of this committee. It is one of those pieces of injustice which have been inflicted upon a citizen without any intention, perhaps, by anybody; but it is a case which appeals for immediate relief, and this bill ought to be passed so that his accounts may be settled according to the law under which he drew his pay.

That is all there is of the case. It comes here with the unanimous report of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and it would not have devolved on me to have made this explanation if the chairman of that committee had been here, or indeed if I had observed that the Senator from New York [Mr. KERNAN] was present; but I think he will bear witness that I have faithfully stated the purport of this bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, no one could be more unsuspecting or unconscious than I was when I inquired of the Secretary from which committee this bill came, as I have inquired in the case of several other bills, that I was about to draw out so eloquent, so instructive, and so copious a statement from the Senator from Indiana or from any other Senator, to all of which I have listened with great pleasure. I inquired merely as I have done in the case of some other committees, from which this bill came, not knowing. However, I am very glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. VOORHEES. I thought the inquiry was very proper, and I tried in good faith and candor to give an answer.

Mr. CONKLING. I am making my acknowledgments to the Senator, although I did not at the moment think of inquiring about the merits of the bill but simply whether it came from a committee, and if so which committee,—an inquiry I often make in respect to bills. I beg to assure the Senator from Indiana that I had no ill-will toward this bill in respect of which he seems to feel an interest.

However, after hearing his statement, I venture to ask this question: how does it happen that this particular claimant—not challenging now the merits of this claim—has any higher right to consideration than all the other persons who by the repeal of the act of 1873 were in the same position as this claimant? If I am not mistaken about the statute to which the Senator referred, it was a statute which had created some comment because it gave back pay, and its repeal affected a good many persons alike. I see that the Senator shakes his head mildly, from which I infer that I am mistaken. If I am, I wish that he will set me right for I have an impression that there are a good many persons whose equity must be exactly like that of this claimant.

Mr. VOORHEES. There is no question of back pay in this matter. It is simply this: when the Government Hospital for the Insane was organized the salary of the superintendent was fixed at a certain amount. Time passed on. It enlarged its proportions; the cares and duties became infinitely greater; and it was thought in the wisdom of Congress, I think in 1867, that $4,000 a year was needed to pay a capable, efficient man at the head of that institution. It did not retract at all. It simply increased his salary to the amount which was thought to be just and proper. He drew his salary according to this last act, not thinking of any change, nor did Congress think of making any change. Finally, when the laws were revised, the revisers of our statutes overlooked the act that increased his salary and adopted in the revision the act which gave him $2,500. In the mean time he had drawn the amount spoken of in this bill under the law of the land. He had received the money under a law which had passed both branches of Congress and been signed by the President of the United States.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator understand that the act increasing this salary referred to this single individual?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes, sir; it did.

Mr. CONKLING. Has the Senator the act under his hand? My recollection is different, and I find the recollection of other Senators supports mine.

Mr. VOORHEES. I think my recollection is right on this subject, and I venture without fear of contradiction to state that the salary of the superintendent of the insane asylum was increased. Whether other increases took place at the same time or not, I do not know. Perhaps there were other officers whose salaries were increased at that time.

Mr. CONKLING. Very well. Now, the Senator will see upon that hypothesis that my criticism is a just one. If there were several officers whose salaries were affected in the same way by the same act, whatever is true of one as to merit is true of another; and therefore I inquired of the Senator, assuming that to be so, why it was, particularly this bill coming from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws which ought to proceed upon the idea of correction of an error in the revision, that that committee selected from the flock one single individual and reported him?

Mr. VOORHEES. I will answer the Senator. Whenever the Senator from New York or anybody else calls my mind to any other act of injustice like this I shall be ready to correct it. The case of Dr. Nicholls has no higher merit than any other case of a similar character. Any other case of a similar character ought to be corrected, and I stand ready to do it. I answer further the question which the Senator from New York propounds. He asks me how the Committee on the Revision of the Laws came to select this case from others. I did not know of others; I knew of this. My attention was strongly called to the case of Dr. Nicholls, and knowing that wrong and injustice had been done him I introduced this bill myself. It was referred to the Committee on Finance, as I have already stated. Thinking it was not germane there, the Committee on Finance had it referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. An able committee does not exist in this body, and they have brought it here. They did not select it out of any lot. They perhaps know of no other such case. I do not. If they do, or if I do, I will go as far as the Senator from New York to remedy the injustice.

I am indebted to the courtesy of the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] for a citation of the very act which the Senator from New York inquired about, for which I am very much obliged to the Senator from Texas. At the second session of the Thirty-ninth Congress, in 1867, I find the following provision in an appropriation act:

GOVERNMENT HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE.

For the support, clothing, and medical treatment of the insane of the Army and Navy and of the revenue cutter service, and of the indigent insane of the District of Columbia, at the Government Hospital for the Insane in said District, including $500 for books, stationery, and incidental expenses, $90,500; and the salary of the superintendent of the said hospital is hereby fixed at $4,000 per annum.

There is the act, and it standing there he proceeded in the discharge of his duty to receive that sum. A few years afterward it was cut down by the revision; the revision cut it down unintentionally I have no doubt. The revisers took the original act fixing $2,500 and put it in the revision, and Congress adopted the revision as an entirety, as we have often heretofore discussed.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator from Indiana to let me say now that I think the statute he reads is a complete answer to the question I put to him. My recollection was that in place of this being an item of itself in an appropriation bill, which was omitted in the subsequent revision, it was an act embracing not only this individual but others, and in that event I should insist more strenuously than I have done so far, that if an error of revision is to be corrected, that error should be corrected for what it is worth and for whomever it applies to. But now the Senator reads a section of the statute which shows that the provision I had in mind is not the provision upon which this bill rests, and therefore my objection is not a good one and the section he reads answers it completely.

Mr. VOORHEES. I believe I have given as full an explanation to the Senate as I wish.

Mr. COCKRELL. My attention was called to this bill when it was first placed upon the Calendar. I have been making some inquiries in regard to it. I made my objection when it was first brought up. Had there been a printed report accompanying this bill, stating the facts as they have been stated by the Senator from Indiana, it might have saved a great deal of trouble. It is a very dangerous way for bills of this character and importance, and amounting, as this may, to a precedent, to be brought into the Senate without any report. The very able Committee on the Revision of the Laws could have given us their reasons in writing and in print for the consideration of this case; and so that I could have more time to look into it myself, I entered my objection as I did at the beginning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. HERFORD in the chair.) The bill will be passed over. The next case will be reported.

Mr. VOORHEES. A single objection does not take this over when it is under consideration.

Several SENATORS. Oh, yes.

Mr. VOORHEES. The bill is under consideration, and I ask a vote on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One objection takes the bill over during the morning hour.

Mr. VOORHEES. By unanimous consent we proceeded to consider the Calendar until two o'clock.

Mr. COCKRELL. I made my objection in the beginning. The Senator asked me to listen to an explanation, but my objection still stands.

Mr. WITHERS. An objection can be interposed at any time.

Mr. VOORHEES. I did not so understand the Senator from Missouri; but as a matter of course I am not going to controvert his statement. I now move to lay aside the pending orders and proceed to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CONKLING. I venture to say that both these Senators on reflection will withdraw what they have done. The Senator from Indiana himself obtained unanimous consent to proceed with the Calendar under the Anthony rule for half an hour. Now I suggest to the Senator from Vermont that he ought not to demand the regular order and that the Senator from Indiana ought not to make a motion in derogation of the unanimous consent.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator from New York read me the Anthony rule? It has escaped my recollection now.

Mr. CONKLING. It provides in substance that we proceed with unobjected cases, and a single objection carries a case over.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then the Senator from New York is correct on that point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has so ruled.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1117) to provide additional accommodations for the Library of Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. From which committee does that come?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. From the Committee on the Library.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert as a substitute for the bill:

That a joint select committee, consisting of three Senators and three Members of the House of Representatives, together with three persons to be appointed by the President of the United States, shall be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to carefully examine the question of a site for the Library of Congress, and report to Congress, as soon as practicable, what location would be most appropriate for the Library and afford the highest advantages for its future growth and permanent accommodations.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President I do not think there will be quite time to consider this question in the five minutes remaining. I am very clear that the original proposition presented here will only result in a delay of the building of the Library for another year. I am quite sure that there will not be time, and with the consent of the Senator from Indiana, as there are but five minutes left in which we can consider this bill, I object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over. The next bill will be read.

JOSEPH R. SHANNON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 33) to ascertain the amount of the claim of Joseph R. Shannon, of Louisiana.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear the report in that case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the committee will first be read.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Claims was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay Joseph R. Shannon, formerly of the State of Louisiana, for the steamboat A. W. Quarrier, impressed into the service of the United States in the year 1862, and destroyed in such service, the sum of $45,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on Claims, January 26, 1880, but was interrupted by Mr. ALLISON. There are but two minutes left of the time specified, and I object to the consideration of the bill. The report seems to be a very long one.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I ask for the following order:

Ordered, That Senate bill No. 1139, for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, be made the special order of the Senate, to follow immediately upon the completion of the pending unfinished business.

Mr. ALLISON. But not to the exclusion of appropriation bills. With that modification, I have no objection.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is hardly in place to make that order in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, who gave notice that he would ask, immediately on the completion of the pending bill, to follow it up by the Geneva award bill. It would hardly be fair to make another special order. I ask the Senator from New Jersey to let his motion remain on the table until the Senator from Ohio comes in.

Mr. RANDOLPH. When the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee gave the notice to which the Senator from West Virginia alludes, I stated to the Senate that I would insist on this order, and I also stated that it was the understanding of the Senate that immediately upon the completion of the pending business the order which I have so frequently asked for and several times obtained would prevail. That has been I believe the understanding of the Senate; at least up to this moment there has been no objection save the one that was made by the Senator from Ohio. The special order in the case I have referred to was made ten or twelve days ago. This is a mere repetition of it, and for the purpose of having it distinctly understood, and not merely generally understood that the order which I ask for shall follow that which is now before the Senate. I think I am right about that.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. There is no question about the statement of the Senator from New Jersey, and the only request I made was to let the matter lie on the table until the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary comes in.

Mr. RANDOLPH. If it can be taken up to-day and acted on, I have no objection.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday is now in order.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 80) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to transport contributions for the relief of the suffering poor of Ireland.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 157) for the relief of M. M. Herr and to pay three messengers of the Senate;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 200) for printing the eulogies delivered in the Senate and House of Representatives upon Hon. Rush Clark, deceased; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 203) making appropriations for the Reform School of the District of Columbia.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 18th instant approved and signed the act (S. No. 325) for the relief of Henry Page; and on this day the act (S. No. 185) for the relief of Gibbes & Company, of Charleston, South Carolina.

MILITARY WARRANT LAND LOCATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 19) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain and certify the amount of land located with military warrants in the States described therein, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. EDMUNDS to postpone the bill indefinitely.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I desire to detain the Senate a short time on this question. I must premise by saying that the arguments made use of before the Senate by some of the Senators who have opposed the bill have struck me as very peculiar. The Senator from Alabama, [Mr. PRYOR] the other day addressed the Senate; I listened to his argument attentively; and my understanding was about this: that his State had neglected so long to call attention to this claim that it struck him unfavorably. I also listened to the argument of the other Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN,] yesterday, in which he took the position that his State would not receive more if this bill passed than she would be taxed for its payment. The inference I drew from his argument was that this was a sufficient reason why the bill should not be voted for. I think I do not misstate the positions of the Senators from Alabama. Now for one moment I desire to call the attention of the Senate to this curious argument.

If we as Senators representing the different States are not to inquire into the legality and justice of a claim presented by another State than our own unless the passage of the bill shall in some way materially benefit the State we represent, I think in such case we will have traveled far from that which ought to guide us in forming our judgments in reference to passing laws. Upon the same principle every bill appropriating money for the harbors of New York, Boston, or Charleston, or for any other harbor in this country, the constituents of other Senators not being benefited by the bill, those Senators may say "our State will receive no benefit from this appropriation, but we shall be taxed so much in order to provide this fund, and therefore we cannot afford to vote for it." I must say that this would be a very incorrect position to assume, and one that I cannot consent to for one moment. In legislation there should be no question in our minds as to whether our own States are directly interested or not in the passage of a bill that is pending. We should consider only whether the bill is a just and a proper one to be passed, no matter whether it affects one State or all the States. At least I have tried, so far as my short legislative career has gone, to govern myself by that principle.

What is the question involved in this bill, Mr. President? It is not what has been stated in some parts of the argument of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] as I understand it. Arguments are sometimes calculated to confuse and obscure the real question, and in many instances obstruct the main pathway to the true merits of a bill. I will not say that this has been intentionally done in this instance, but that has been the effect in some degree.

Now, sir, I assert this proposition to be true, that the trust which was to be executed by the Government of the United States in relation to the expenditure of 2 per cent. of the 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of public lands payable to the different States has nothing whatever to do with the question in this bill. The trust referred to by the Senator from Vermont and by one of the Senators from Alabama yesterday was in regard to internal improvements that were undertaken by the Government of the United States. For the completion of those improvements 2 per cent. of this 5 per cent. fund was to be expended.

Without discussing that question in this connection, I here assert, that by the action of Congress, by the decisions of the departments of the Government, by an absolute abandonment of that trust on the part of the Government of the United States, it was turned over to the different States, and ceased further to exist so far as the Government of the United States was concerned.

Then this proposition is entirely independent of that. What is this proposition? It is whether or not the contract entered into between the Government and the States mentioned in this bill, whereby they were to receive 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, embraced entries of lands other than for money. In other words, whether or not land warrants, which were given by the Government of the United States as part payment to its soldiers as compensation for their services, should be treated by the Government as an obligation of indebtedness, and whether lands exchanged by the Government in payment of these obligations should be subject to the charge of the 5 per cent. the same as if disposed of for money; whether or not there was a consideration between the soldier and the Government—a consideration between the State and the Government? These are the questions presented by this bill.

In order that we may understand these questions fully I will call the attention of the Senate to the different laws that have been passed giving lands or bounties, as they are commonly called, or land warrants, or scrip, to persons who served the Government of the United States. The theory upon which the Government acted at the time in the enactment of these laws was that this was part payment for the services performed in behalf of the Government by the soldiers. The very first enactment on this subject shows this to be true, and will be found in the Journal of the American Congress of 1776. September 16 Congress provided for the raising of eighty-eight battalions to serve for the war. The resolution of Congress was as follows:

Resolved, That in addition to a money bounty of $20 to each non-commissioned officer and private soldier, Congress make provision for granting lands in the following proportions: To the officers and soldiers who shall engage in the service, and continue therein to the close of the war, or until discharged by Congress, and to the representatives of such officers and soldiers as shall be slain by the enemy, such lands to be provided by the United States; and whatever expense shall be necessary to procure such lands, the said expense shall be paid and borne by the United States in the same proportion as the other expenses of the war, namely: to a colonel, five hundred acres; to a lieutenant-colonel, four hundred and fifty acres; to a major, four hundred acres; to a captain, three hundred acres; to a lieutenant, two hundred acres; to an ensign, one hundred and fifty acres; to each non-commissioned officer and soldier, one hundred acres.

By this act the land was a part of the pay promised to the soldier for services that he should perform in behalf of the Government. The $20 cash bounty and the land, which has been called a bounty in this discussion, were each a part of the agreement between the Government and the soldier at the time. The Commonwealth of Virginia, impressed with the importance of augmenting the Army at once, almost immediately after the passage of the above act by Congress, passed an act providing for raising her part of the troops demanded by Congress:

October, 1776.—An act for raising six additional battalions of infantry on the Continental establishment.

Whereas it has been thought necessary by the American Congress that the armies of the United States should be augmented to eighty-eight battalions, to be enlisted to serve during the continuance of the present war, unless sooner discharged, and that fifteen of said battalions should be furnished by this Commonwealth, and that the said Congress, by their resolutions, have to give to every non-commissioned officer and private soldier a present bounty of twenty dollars * * * and to provide the following portion of land to be given at the close of the war, or whenever so discharged, to the officers and soldiers who shall engage in said service, or to their representatives, if slain by the enemy: To every non-commissioned officer or soldier, 100 acres; to every ensign, 150 acres; to every lieutenant, 200 acres; to every captain, 300 acres; to every major, 400 acres; to every lieutenant-colonel, 450 acres; to every colonel, 500 acres:

Be it therefore enacted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Virginia, That it shall and may be lawful for the governor, with the advice of his privy council, and he and they are hereby required, to take such measures as to them shall seem most expedient for engaging the said battalions * * * and for that purpose to give recruiting powers to the officers commanding the same, or to send special commissioners, if that measure shall appear more effectual, or to adopt any other way or means most likely to procure their speedy enlistment, &c.—Henning's Statutes of the Commonwealth of Virginia, volume 9, page 179.

October, 1778.—An act for the speedy recruiting of the Virginia regiments or Continental establishment.

Whereas the different modes heretofore adopted for the making up of the deficiencies in the quota of Continental troops to be furnished by this State have been found inadequate to the purpose, and it is indispensably necessary that the regiments of infantry be speedily recruited to render the operations of the ensuing campaign more decisive and honorable to the American arms,

Be it enacted, That twenty-two hundred and sixteen men, rank and file, be forthwith raised within this Commonwealth, and that each person who shall enlist to serve eighteen months, to commence from the day of their several rendezvous, shall be entitled to $300, and that each person who will enlist for three years or during the war shall be entitled to $400, together with the Continental bounty of lands, &c.

In 1779 (Henning's Statutes, volume 10, page 24) we find the land grant was extended to the marines, also to the soldiers under Colonel George Rogers Clarke; also to chaplains and surgeons, and their mates, in the Army.

We find also in October, 1779, an act extending the same privileges. This act declares the quantity of land which it was intended the officers and soldiers should have at the end of the war, namely: Colonel, 5,000 acres; lieutenant-colonel, 4,500 acres; major, 4,000 acres; captain, 3,000 acres; every subaltern, 2,000 acres; every non-commissioned officer, 400 acres; every soldier or sailor, 200 acres.

It will be seen by the foregoing act of the first Congress of the United States that the policy was early adopted of offering inducements to enlistments in the Army in time of, or in anticipation of, war, by appropriating public lands in part payment of those who enlisted and faithfully served in the military service, in addition to the money bounty and monthly compensation paid.

Afterward, in the war of 1812-'15 with Great Britain, we find that before the declaration of that war Congress provided as a part of the compensation to those who enlisted or re-enlisted in the military service of the United States that they should receive, upon certificate of faithful service, one hundred and sixty acres of the public domain.

December 24, 1811.—An act for completing the existing military establishment.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the military establishment, as now authorized by law, be immediately completed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there be allowed and paid to each effective, able-bodied man, recruited or re-enlisted for that service for the term of five years, unless sooner discharged, the sum of $16; but the payment of one-half of said bounty shall be deferred until he shall be mustered and have joined the corps in which he is to serve; and whenever any non-commissioned officer or soldier shall be discharged from the service, who shall have obtained from the commanding officer of his company, battalion or regiment a certificate that he had faithfully performed his duty while in service, he shall moreover be allowed and paid in addition to the aforesaid bounty three months' pay and one hundred and sixty acres of land; and the heirs and representatives of those non-commissioned officers or soldiers who may be killed in action, or die in the service of the United States, shall likewise be paid and allowed the said additional bounty of three months' pay and one hundred and sixty acres of land, to be designated, surveyed, and laid off at the public expense, in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as may be provided by law.—United States Statutes at Large, volume 2, page 669.

This statute, it will be seen, gave this bounty upon the condition of the service of the soldier, when he received a certificate at the time of his discharge that he had served honorably and faithfully in the service of the Government. When we come to read this act in connection with the acts preceding it by the then Congress at the time of the Revolution, we find that the principle ran through all of them that the lands were a part of the consideration to the soldier for his services in behalf of the Government of the United States.

The following enactments by Congress, which in every instance relate to future enlistments, entitled the enlisted men to lands for services in that war:

January 11, 1812.—An act to raise additional military force.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be immediately raised ten regiments of infantry, two of artillery, and one regiment of light dragoons, to be enlisted for the term of five years, unless sooner discharged.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed and paid to each effective, able-bodied man recruited as aforesaid to serve for the term of five years, a bounty of $16, but the payment of $8 of the said bounty shall be deferred until he shall be mustered and have joined some military corps of the United States for service; and whenever any non-commissioned officer or soldier shall be discharged from service, who shall have obtained from the commanding officer of his company, battalion, or regiment a certificate that he had faithfully performed his duty whilst in service, he shall, moreover, be allowed and paid in addition to the said bounty three months' pay and one hundred and sixty acres of land, and the heirs and representatives of those non-commissioned officers or soldiers who may be killed in action or die in the service of the United States, shall likewise be paid and allowed the said additional bounty of three months' pay and one hundred and sixty acres of land, to be designated, surveyed, and laid off at the public expense in such a manner and upon such terms and conditions as may be provided by law.

February 6, 1812.—An act authorizing the President of the United States to accept and organize certain volunteer military corps.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept of any company or companies of volunteers, either of artillery, cavalry, or infantry, who may associate and offer themselves for the service, not exceeding fifty thousand men, who shall be clothed, and in case of cavalry, furnished with horses at their own expense, and armed and equipped at the expense of the United States after they shall be called into service, and whose commissioned officers shall be appointed in the manner prescribed by law in the several States and Territories to which such company shall respectively belong: Provided, That where any company, battalion, regiment, brigade, or division shall continue to be commanded by the officers holding commissions in the same at the time of such tender; and any vacancy thereafter occurring shall be filled in the mode pointed out by law in the State or Territory wherein the said company, battalion, regiment, brigade, or division shall have been originally raised.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the heirs and representatives of any non-commissioned officer or soldier who may be killed in action or die in actual service of the United States, shall be entitled to receive one hundred and sixty acres of land, to be designated, surveyed, and laid off at the public expense in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as may be provided by law.

December 12, 1812.—An act increasing the pay of non-commissioned officers, musicians, privates, and others of the Army, and for other purposes.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That every non-commissioned officer, musician, and private who shall, on the promulgation of this act, be recruited into the regular Army of the United States, may, at his option, to be made at the time of enlistment, engage to serve during the present war with Great Britain, instead of the term of five years; and shall, in case he make such option, be entitled to the same bounty in money and land and to all other allowances, and be subject to the same rules and regulations, as if he had enlisted for the term of five years.

January 27, 1814.—An act making further provision for filling the ranks of the regular Army, encouraging enlistments for longer periods of men whose terms of service are about to expire.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in order to complete the present military establishment to the full number authorized by Congress and the law with the greatest possible dispatch, there shall be paid to each effective, able-bodied man who shall, after the 1st day of February next, be enlisted into the Army of the United States, to serve for the term of five years or during the war, at his election, in lieu of the bounty in money and of three months' pay at the expiration of the service now allowed by law, the sum of $124, $50 of which to be paid at the time the recruit is enlisted, $50 when he shall be mustered and have joined some military corps for service, and $24 when he shall be discharged from service; and the wife and children, and, if he leave no wife or children, the parents, of such non-commissioned officers and soldiers enlisted as hereinbefore stated, who may be killed in action or die in the service of the United States, shall be allowed and paid the sum of $24; and after the 1st day of February next, so much of the fourth section of the act entitled "An act for the more perfect organization of the Army of the United States," passed the 20th day of January 1813, as allows to each able-bodied man enlisted into the service of the United States in the manner therein stated, an advance of $24 on account of his pay, shall be and the same is hereby repealed.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That every non-commissioned officer, musician, and private who has been recruited in the regular Army of the United States under the authority of the act of the 8th of April, 1812, entitled "An act to raise an additional military force," passed January 11, 1812, may be re-enlisted for the term of five years or during the war; and that every non-commissioned officer, musician, and private recruited under the authority of the act of the 29th of January, 1812, entitled "An act in addition to an act entitled 'An act to raise an additional military force, and for other purposes,'" may be re-enlisted for five years or during the war.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates re-enlisted under the authority of the preceding section shall be entitled to the bounty allowed by this act to recruits for five years or during the war.

[Volume 3, chapter 9.]

January 24, 1814.—An act authorizing the President of the United States to cause certain regiments therein mentioned to be enlisted for five years or during the war.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to cause to be enlisted for the term of five years or during the war the fourteen regiments of infantry which are now by law authorized to be enlisted for the term of one year, or such number of them, or of the troops composing the same, as in his opinion will best promote the public service.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That each man enlisted under the authority of this act shall be allowed the same bounty in money and land as is now allowed by law to men enlisted for five years or during the war, and that the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates shall receive the same pay, clothing, subsistence, and forage, be entitled to the same benefits, be subject to the same rules and regulations, and be placed in every respect on the same footing as the other regular troops of the United States.

February 10, 1814.—An act to raise three regiments of riflemen.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be immediately raised such number of regiments of riflemen, not exceeding as in the opinion of the President will best promote the military service, to serve for five years or during the war, unless sooner discharged.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That each man recruited under the authority of this act be allowed the same bounty in money and land as is allowed by law to men enlisted for five years or during the war, and that the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates shall receive the same pay, clothing, subsistence, and forage, and be entitled to the same provisions for wounds and disabilities, the same benefits and allowances, and be placed in every respect on the same footing as the other regular troops of the United States.

December 10, 1814.—An act making further provisions for filling the ranks of the Army of the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That in lieu of the bounty of one hundred and sixty acres of land now allowed by law, there shall be allowed to each non-commissioned officer and soldier hereafter enlisted, when discharged from service, who shall have obtained from the commanding officer of company, battalion, or regiment, a certificate that he had faithfully performed his duty while in service, three hundred and twenty acres of land, to be surveyed, laid off, and granted under the same regulation, and in every respect in a manner prescribed by law, and the widow and children, and if there be no widow and children, the parents of every non-commissioned officer and soldier enlisted according to law, who may be killed or die in the service of the United States shall be paid, but the same shall not pass to collateral relations, any law heretofore passed to the contrary notwithstanding.

It will also be observed that Congress, during the war with Mexico, in providing for raising a military force for that purpose, induced enlistments by offering lands, as shown by the following acts:

February 11, 1847.—An act to raise for a limited time an additional military force, and for other purposes.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in addition to the present military establishment of the United States, there shall be raised and organized under direction of the President for and during the war with Mexico, one regiment of dragoons and nine regiments of infantry, each to be composed of the same number and rank of commissioned and non-commissioned officers, buglers, musicians, and privates, &c., as are provided for a regiment of dragoons and infantry, respectively, under existing laws, and allowances according to their respective grades, and be subject to the same regulations, and to the rules and articles of war.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That during the continuance of the war with Mexico the term of enlistment for the men to be recruited for the regiments authorized by this act shall be during the war, unless sooner discharged.

February 11, 1847.—SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That each non-commissioned officer, private, or musician enlisted or to be enlisted in the regular Army, or regularly mustered in any volunteer company for a period of not less than twelve months, who have served or may serve during the present war with Mexico, and who shall receive an honorable discharge, or who shall have been killed, or died of wounds received or sickness incurred in the course of such service, or who shall have been discharged before the expiration of his term of service in consequence of wounds received or sickness incurred in the course of such service, shall be entitled to receive a certificate or warrant from the War Department for the quantity of one hundred and sixty acres, and which may be located by the warrantee or his heirs-at-law at any land office of the United States, in one body, and in conformity to the legal subdivision of the public lands in such district then subject to private entry; and upon the return of such certificate or warrant, with evidence of the location thereof having been legally made to the General Land Office, a patent shall be issued therefor.

Provided further, That every such non-commissioned officer, musician, or private who may be entitled under the provisions of this act to receive a certificate or warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of land, shall be allowed the option to receive such certificate or warranty or a Treasury scrip for $100; and such scrip, whenever it is preferred, shall be issued by the Secretary of the Treasury to such person or persons as would be authorized to receive such certificate or warrants for lands; said scrip to bear an interest of 6 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government; and that each private, non-commissioned officer, and musician who shall have been received into the service of the United States since the commencement of the war with Mexico for less than twelve months, and shall have served for such term or until honorably discharged, shall be entitled to receive a warrant for forty acres of land, which may be subject to private entry, or $25 in scrip if preferred.

March 3, 1847.—An act to amend an act entitled "An act to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That under the provisions of the ninth section of the act approved February 11, 1847, entitled "An act to raise, for a limited time, an additional military force, and for other purposes," it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue Treasury scrip as therein provided, on the certificate of the Secretary of War, showing the claimant entitled thereto, and not otherwise, and that the stock thus issued shall bear interest from the day of presenting to the Treasury Department such certificate of the Secretary of War in due form, and the interest thereon shall be paid on the 1st days of January and July in each year, and shall be transferable on the books of the Treasury Department kept in the Register's Office. Such certificate shall be signed by the Register of the Treasury under the direction of the Secretary, who shall cause the seal of the Department to be affixed thereto; and no other signature shall be required to said stock.

September 28, 1850.—An act granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That each of the surviving, or widow or minor children of deceased commissioned or non-commissioned officers, musicians, or privates, whether of regulars, volunteers, rangers, or militia, who performed military service in the regiment, company, or detachment in the service of the United States in the war with Great Britain declared by the United States on the 18th of June, 1812, or in any of the Indian wars since 1790, and each of the commissioned officers who was engaged in the military service of the United States in the late war with Mexico, shall be entitled to land as follows: Those who engaged twelve months or during the war, and actually served nine months, shall receive one hundred and sixty acres, and those who engaged to serve six months and actually served four months, shall receive eighty acres, and those who engaged to serve for any, or indefinite period, and actually served one month, shall receive forty acres.

From all these acts, it will be seen that in the great wars in which the United States have been engaged lands were offered to induce enlistments in the military service of the Government. And Congress, in all its provisions in this respect, makes no distinction between the money and land compensation to be paid the soldier for his services in the Army.

The legal effect of all these acts of Congress, and the enlistment of the soldiery of the country under them in our several wars, is, that as soon as the soldier enlisted under and pursuant to the provisions of any of these statutes, a contract sprung into existence, whereby the enlisted soldier, by reason of his enlistment, contracted and agreed with the United States to render military service in the Army of the Government, in whatever capacity he might be assigned, according to the laws and rules governing the Army, for a given time; and in consideration of that service the United States, by her statute under which the enlistment took place, contracted and agreed to pay such enlisted soldier the bounty in money prescribed by that act—a stated monthly wage—and at the end of his term of service, upon the certificate of the proper officer that he had faithfully performed his duty as such soldier, to secure to him, of the public domain, one hundred and sixty acres of land, or whatever quantity agreed upon under the law.

You will find the laws passed in reference to this question with one exception preceded the enlistment of the soldier. They were passed at the time the compensation was fixed, when it was provided that he should receive any money, and became a part of the payment for his services rendered to the Government, and was not considered in any single instance as a gift, or, as we might term it, a bounty. It was based upon a consideration passing from the soldier to the Government as a part of his pay. He received it for services and not as a gift.

The first question, as I stated, is, was there a consideration between the soldier and the Government for the bounty land warrant or scrip, as it is termed, that was issued by the Government to the soldier for his services? I take it that there was a consideration and a good and valid one. It is immaterial whether it was in scrip, whether it was a land warrant, a Government bond, a United States note, or gold or silver. When I say it was a payment to the soldier, I mean that it was an obligation from the Government to the soldier, to him of value, and that obligation might be discharged by the Government in a certain way. It could be discharged by the Government when the Government permitted that soldier or his assignee to lay the warrant upon a certain number of acres of land belonging to the Government. He then obtained his deed or certificate of purchase, and it was as much a payment by the Government of an indebtedness when it gave a deed for the location of this warrant or scrip as it was if he had purchased the land with the money of the Government. There is no distinction between the two cases; it was the same to the Government.

Suppose, according to our land laws, lands could only be purchased from the Government by the payment of money, and that Congress to-day should pass a law authorizing the Government to receive the 4 per cent. bonds of the Government in lieu of money for the land subject to entry at the land offices, I ask any one to tell me if such a bond would not be a payment to the Government for that land? Would that land not be sold by the Government? It would not be sold for cash, we would say, but it would be sold by the Government for the purpose of releasing it from an indebtedness it owed to the individual holding the bond. If that be true, the man who held a land warrant of the Government, it being an obligation of the Government that could only be discharged by the Government allowing him to take so much land in lieu of that warrant, it was a discharge of an obligation upon the part of the Government, and was as much a sale of the land as if the land had been sold for cash.

But some of our friends say, in fact it was said by one of the Senators from Alabama that if this bill should be passed the Government would become responsible for all of the lands that have been given to railroads and canals, that have been given for schools, &c. So far as I am concerned my mind leads me in a very different direction. There is a broad distinction between a grant and an exchange for an obligation based on a good consideration, such as this was, passing between the individual and the Government. So far as the question regarding the lands given to railroads is concerned, it was well answered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] when he informed Senators that all the lands granted to railroads were granted in alternate sections, and that upon the sections reserved by the Government the price was doubled to $2.50 an acre, which left the Government in the possession of the same amount of money from the sale of the alternate sections of land as if they had not granted any land whatever to railroad corporations. Hence the 5 per cent. is being paid to-day to the different States on lands embraced in every railroad grant the same precisely as if the Government had not granted the land at all.

The question then arises, shall the Government pay this 5 per cent. on the lands entered with warrants to the different States with whom they entered into a contract or compact at the time of their admission into the Union that they were to receive 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands? Was there a consideration for that between the States and the Government? Before I undertake to give my views in reference to that question, I will say that the Congress of the United States has construed that law, and I call the attention of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to the fact that Congress has construed this law in reference to his own State. At the time that this trust was abandoned by the Government that it was attempting to execute in reference to all of these States, of using 2 per cent. of this 5 per cent. for public improvement, Congress passed a law to make a settlement with some of these States in reference to this whole question. The act for the admission of the States of Alabama and Mississippi contains similar provisions to the act for the admission of the State of Illinois—that is, that 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands shall be used for certain purposes. Two per cent. was to be used in reference to the Northwestern Territory in building a certain road. In regard to Alabama and Mississippi it was to be used in a different way; but up to that time the trust had not been executed by the Government, and it was concluded on the part of the Government that it should be abandoned. Mississippi and Alabama then asked for a settlement between the Government and these States. Following that Missouri did the same thing. Upon what basis was this settlement made?

In the case of Alabama, Congress recognized the doctrine we contend for now, by an act entitled "An act to settle certain accounts between the United States and the State of Alabama," approved March 2, 1855. By that law it was enacted—

That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be, and he is hereby, required to state an account between the United States and the State of Alabama, for the purpose of ascertaining what sum or sums of money are due to said State, heretofore unsettled, under the sixth section of the act of March 2, 1819, for the admission of Alabama into the Union, and that he be required to include in said account the several reservations under the various treaties with the Chickasaw, Choctaw, and Creek Indians within the limits of Alabama, and allow and pay to said State 5 per cent. thereon, as in case of other sales.

When the Government abandoned the trust, as I said, that it had undertaken to execute for the State of Alabama in reference to the expenditure of the 2 per cent. fund, and when the settlement was made, it settled with Alabama upon what condition? Upon the condition that all the Indian reservations within the State of Alabama that had been withheld from public sale by the Government? On the consideration, sir, that the Government of the United States had given these Indian tribes certain lands in Alabama in lieu of lands that the Indians possessed prior to that time.

Mr. MORGAN. I believe that at the time of the passage of the law to which the Senator refers there were military land warrants outstanding which were then permitted by law to be located upon public lands, and land warrants had been located. Will the Senator from Illinois explain to me, if he can, why in the making of this settlement Alabama contented herself simply with including the reservations in favor of the Indians and said nothing about the military land warrants?

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator, being a representative of Alabama, is certainly much more competent to explain why Alabama rested satisfied than I am.

Mr. MORGAN. I can only give an opinion, if the Senator will allow me. Up to that time Alabama never thought of making such a claim.

Mr. LOGAN. That may possibly be, but at the time this law was passed, upon the same principle, if Alabama never thought of making this claim for lands taken by the Government in the payment of its own debts on the sales on which the Government had contracted with Alabama to pay 5 per cent., how did Alabama come to think of the Indian reservations. I should like to know the distinction between the Government reserving lands to pay Indians, and taking lands to pay land warrants.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know that there is any distinction, but Alabama evidently was contending at that time for an amendment to this law, a construction of it, and she did not see that it was just or in accordance with her relations to the Union at that time that she should press her amendment any further than covering Indian reservations, and she made no claim on account of the military land warrants.

Mr. LOGAN. I am only discussing this question from what the law says, and from what, upon a fair and honest construction of this law, any one would understand that it means. If the Senator from Alabama, who is so fearful that his State will pay more in taxation if this bill passes than it will receive from the appropriation, will explain to me why Senators and Representatives of Alabama would ask for the payment of 5 per cent. upon the Indian reservations, and then say that upon the same principle land upon which warrants have been laid should not be paid for, I should like to hear it. I should like to have some gentleman versed in the law explain to me the distinction between the Government paying on Indian lands reserved in Alabama and Mississippi and paying on soldiers' lands given for land warrants, in view of a consideration passing between the soldier and the Government, the same as between the Indians and the Government.

Alabama received, I believe, about $120,000 as 5 per cent. on these Indian reservations at that time. The lands then were estimated at $1.25 per acre, that being the minimum price of the public lands of this country. Alabama having received that, now criticises other States because they say that the lands were taken to pay soldiers, and therefore we should not receive it. The distinction is this, that the Government owed the Indian and paid him in lands, and Alabama took the 5 per cent. of the land that the Government owed the Indians, but the soldiers to whom the Government owed land they are not willing to take the 5 per cent. on. Is the Indian better than the soldier, or the lands different?

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from Illinois undertakes to attribute to me any expression of that sort from anything I said I desire to say—

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all; I say no such thing. I am making my own argument. I am speaking of the logic of it.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from Illinois expects to make capital by putting me in a position of antagonism to the soldiers he has mistaken—

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all. I mean no such thing. The Senator knows that I am incapable of doing a thing of that kind; at least he ought to know it, for I have never attempted that anywhere. I did not say the Senator said so, but I say there is no principle upon which Alabama can receive 5 per cent. on Indian reservations given by Congress to the Indians in lieu of other Indian lands and refuse to receive 5 per cent. upon the lands given to the soldiers, unless there is a difference between the Indian and the soldier in reference to this question, which there certainly is not as far as the question is concerned. That is what I said or intended to say. There is no distinction so far as the principle is concerned. The question is whether the Government, when it received a consideration for this land, made such a sale as will authorize them to pay to a State 5 per cent. as they agreed in the compact they made with the State when it became one of the sisterhood of States.

Now, let us go a little further with this law. My friend from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] dwelt long the other day on the words "sales of public lands" and "net proceeds of the sales of public lands." Right here, in this very last line of the law, the matter is explained, and a construction is given to the word "sales" as applicable to these lands. What is it? Speaking of these treaties with and reservations for the Chickasaw, Choctaw, and Creek Indians within the limits of Alabama, the act of March 2, 1855, which I have just read, says:

And allow and pay to said State 5 per cent. thereon, as in case of other sales.

"Other sales." I ask the Senator to tell me what the Congress of the United States meant when it said "as in case of other sales." Did it not consider that a sale? Why did it use the words "other sales?" When Congress was giving the 5 per cent. on these Indian reservations, if it did not consider them sales by the Government to the Indians, why did it not say that 5 per cent. shall be counted on the Indian reservations the same as on sales of lands? But it said these reservations shall be counted "the same as other sales," showing conclusively that the Government then understood that this was a sale made by the Government to the Indians, and therefore the Government became responsible to the State of Alabama for the 5 per cent. the same as on lands sold for other purposes.

Let us go a little further and see what Congress intended. Two years later Congress reaffirmed this doctrine by an act entitled "An act to settle certain accounts between the United States and the State of Mississippi and other States." What other States? It had settled with Alabama. What other States were there then? The very States that are now mentioned in this bill, excepting those that have become a part of the Union since that law passed. Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, and a number of States had the same compact with the Government of the United States in reference to the 5 per cent. on the sales of public lands. Alabama having had a law passed and receiving her 5 per cent., Congress passed a law for Mississippi and in the very title they say to settle certain accounts with the State of Mississippi and other States. What other States? Other States having the same contract with the Government. None other could have been intended. What is that act? It is "An act to settle certain accounts between the United States and the State of Mississippi and other States," approved March 3, 1857. The act provides:

That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be, and he is hereby, required to state an account between the United States and the State of Mississippi, for the purpose of ascertaining what sum or sums of money are due to said State, heretofore unsettled, on account of public lands in said State—and upon the same principles of allowance and settlement as prescribed in the act to settle certain accounts between the United States and the State of Alabama, approved the 2d of March, 1855, and that he be required to include in said account the several reservations under the various treaties with the Chickasaw and Choctaw Indians within the limits of Mississippi, and allow and pay to said State 5 per cent. thereon, as in case of other sales, estimating the lands at the value of $1.25 per acre.

Another section was added to the act. What is that? It reads:

That the said Commissioner shall also state an account between the United States and each of the other States upon the same principles, and shall allow and pay to each State such amount as shall thus be found due, estimating all lands and permanent reservations at $1.25 per acre.

It seems to me quite manifest that the thing sought to be accomplished by the bill under consideration was fully intended by Congress in the passage of the second section of the act last referred to. There can be no question but the section referred to States other than Mississippi, which under their respective acts of admission were entitled to 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of all the lands within their borders. Then, mark the language of the second section. It commands the Commissioner of the General Land Office to state an account, &c., and to allow and pay, &c., "estimating all lands and permanent reservations at $1.25 per acre."

The precedent established by authority of the acts of 1855 and 1857, relating to the States of Alabama and Mississippi, would justify the allowance of 5 per cent. on all lands embraced within any of these newly admitted States not granted as I have before stated. Then how much more forcibly must it strike our reason, that the lands absorbed in those States by the location of military land warrants (which is but an outstanding obligation of the United States for services rendered the Government) would entitle the State within which the lands thus absorbed are situate to the 5 per cent. provided for in the act of its admission?

I wish to ask the Senator from Alabama, who has criticised this bill, a question. He says that Alabama did not dream that land warrants were included perhaps. Let us see whether that was the intention of this law. In the second section reference is made to other States having the same contract with the Government. The Commissioner shall state an account and settle with the other States upon the same principles. What principles? Upon the same principles that the Government authorized him to settle with Alabama. What were those principles? Congress explained it in this second section:

And shall allow and pay to each State such amount as shall thus be found due, estimating all lands and permanent reservations at $1.25 per acre.

"All lands." What lands? Lands entered with money? Not at all, but "all lands." "All lands?" What lands? All lands having been disposed of by the Government upon the same principles that these lands were disposed of, that is for a consideration passing between the Government and the party obtaining the land. That was the principle. Hence, inasmuch as consideration passed between the Indians and the Government, all lands in those States were to be included and were included that had been disposed of upon that principle—that is, not for cash, but where the consideration passed between the Government and the party. No construction has ever been given to this statute in any different way by the best lawyers of this land. That is the construction given to this law by Judge Curtis. He held that the Government had abandoned its trust in reference to this 5 per cent., and that the Government must settle upon the principles found in the Alabama and Mississippi cases. The present Secretary of State gave an opinion that the principle involved in the Alabama and Mississippi cases applied to all the other States. So have judges that were on the supreme bench held, and many others of the best lawyers in this country.

Of course at the time that those questions were raised the matter of land-warrant entries was not in the case. The question then was as to the 2 per cent. fund, as to whether the Government had abandoned its trust and turned it over to the States, and the States were, therefore, entitled to receive the 2 per cent. That was the question, and in deciding that question they affirm the principle as laid down in the statutes in reference to Alabama and Mississippi, and insist that the Commissioner of the General Land Office should settle with the other States upon the same principle that he settled with these States.

What was the consideration between the Government of the United States and the States upon which we base this claim? There must have been some consideration. It was not a gift. What was it? I will take Illinois merely for the purpose of illustrating, because the same principle applies to all the States mentioned in this bill.

The convention of the people of the Territory of Illinois, that framed the constitution and established the government of that State, on the 26th day of August, 1818, accepted, confirmed, and ratified the propositions contained in the act of Congress for her admission into the Union in the following language:

Therefore, this convention, on behalf of and by authority of the people of the State, do accept of the foregoing propositions, and do further ordain and declare that every and each tract of land sold by the United States, from and after the 1st day of January, 1819, shall remain exempt from any tax laid by order or under any authority of the State, whether for State, county, or township, or any purpose whatever, for the term of five years, from and after the day of sale. And that the bounty lands granted, or hereafter to be granted, for military service during the late war, shall, while they continue to be held by the patentees, or their heirs, remain exempt, as aforesaid, from all taxes for the term of three years, from and after the dates of the patents, respectively; and that all the lands belonging to the citizens of the United States residing without the said State shall never be taxed higher than lands belonging to persons residing therein. And this convention do further ordain and declare, that the foregoing ordinance shall not be revoked without the consent of the United States.

There was the consideration, and one, too, of the highest character. Illinois as well as all these other States agreed with the Government of the United States that they would exempt from taxation the public lands within their States. What lands? All lands of the Government, after they had been purchased or located with a land warrant, for five years or for three years. They denied themselves a large amount of revenue that they would have received for the benefit of their State. That amount of revenue doubtless would have equaled the amount to be realized from the 5 per cent. In the five years it doubtless would have amounted to more than 5 per cent. on the sales of the public lands. We withheld taxation and agreed that no lands of a non-resident in the State should ever be taxed at a higher rate than the lands of a resident were taxed. That was our part of the contract. We have faithfully performed our part of the contract. No tax has ever been levied until the time expired, according to the compact and agreement between the Government and the State. We have kept it faithfully on our part. Why, then, shall the Government not keep it on its part? A contract between the Government and a State is just as binding or it ought to be just as binding as a contract between individuals. If a contract is made between individuals in the Senate to-day, and is complied with on the part of one, certainly the obligation is binding on the other that he shall comply and carry out his part of it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to ask him whether his State has not already received 5 per cent. on all the lands sold in the State?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; it has not.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understand that the payment of 5 per cent. has been made upon the proceeds of all the lands sold in all these States.

Mr. LOGAN. I say that it has not; the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. SAULSBURY. There is nothing in this bill providing for taking money out of the public Treasury by reason of the public lands which have been converted into money. I understand that on all the lands which have been converted into money by the Government 5 per cent. has been paid to all the States embraced in this bill. If that is not true, then I am laboring under a misapprehension.

Mr. LOGAN. That is not true. It might be true in the view of the Senator with his construction of the law, but in my mind it is not true. Inasmuch as the Senator asks if we have not received 5 per cent. on all the lands sold, I say no. It is a long story to go back over it, but I will say to the Senator that the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri have not received up to this day a certain portion of the 2 per cent. of the 5 per cent. fund.

Mr. ALLISON. On cash sales?

Mr. LOGAN. On cash sales.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator is speaking of the claim for 5 per cent.

Mr. LOGAN. I am; but the Senator asked me if the States have not received the 5 per cent. on all the lands sold for cash. I say no. There has been a bill before Congress for over twelve years, pressed by three States, to have the money paid to them that the Government pretended to expend, being 2 per cent. of the 5 per cent. fund. That bill has passed the House, I do not know how many times, and at one time it lacked two votes of passing the Senate. When the Senator asks me the broad question I answer as the facts are. I presume the Senator meant to ask whether we were not asking 5 per cent. on lands that had not been sold for cash.

Mr. SAULSBURY. No, I mean just what I said.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I answer the Senator as I have answered him, that we have not. The Senator, I presume, insists that lands taken up by land warrants are not sales. I say they are. On those lands we have received nothing whatever, not even 2 per cent.; nor 3 per cent., nor any other per cent.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That I understand to be the exact question raised by the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the exact question, and that is the reason why I have answered the Senator as I have. While the Senator was out of his seat of course I could not inform him or give him any light whatever. I was trying to show that by the act of Congress providing for a settlement with the States of Alabama and Mississippi the very construction that I now claim was given to this settlement of 5 per cent. with those States; that there the authority was given to pay 5 per cent. on lands which had not been sold for cash but which had been taken in exchange for other lands. They were not cash sales but sales. I might use the term "exchange." They were exchanged for other lands, and yet Congress passed a law allowing 5 per cent. upon those lands. On the same principle we ask to-day that Congress shall allow Illinois and the other States associated with her the 5 per cent. upon lands that have been taken by land warrants given by the Government of the United States in order that it might be released from an obligation that it was under to the persons who held these warrants. If I give a note to the Senator from Delaware for a thousand dollars and when that note becomes due he is under obligation to do a certain thing for some other party, and I release him from that obligation and perform his obligation, although I do not pay the cash, I cannot understand that this is not a full satisfaction of that obligation, just as complete as if I paid a thousand dollars in cash. It is done at his instance. Does not the Senator so understand it?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I need not give the Senator my views on that question.

Mr. LOGAN. I only put that case to see whether it meets the Senator's view or not. If I can release an obligation to the Senator for money in any other way that satisfies him, it is a release of the obligation; and he would not be acting in good faith, at least it seems so to me, if he would come to me again and say, "You have got to repay that obligation because you did not pay it in cash." I do not think it would be very sound, it certainly would not be very just, and I do not think that the Senator would indulge in a construction of that kind.

When the Legislature of Illinois and all of these other States refrained from taxing for five years the lands that were sold and disposed of by the Government, and withheld that revenue from their own coffers, and allowed the Government of the United States to receive its benefits from the land, I say then that that obligation was just as binding between the Government and these States as if the States had paid millions upon millions of dollars to the Government of the United States for this right to receive 5 per cent. of the lands.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask my honorable friend a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To his very able argument I have listened with great pleasure; and I wish to put a question to him. As applied to the State of Illinois (of course there are so many States in the bill that we have to take one at a time) on the very point the Senator is now speaking of, the United States agreed on account of this 5 per cent., as it is said, of the net proceeds, two-fifths to be disbursed by Congress, and three-fifths to be paid over to the State for learning, a part of it to be devoted for a university, first, that the lands sold should not be taxed "for the term of five years from and after the day of sale;" but, second, "that the bounty lands granted, or hereafter to be granted, for military services shall, while they continue to be held by the patentees, or their heirs, remain exempt * * * for the term of three years." Under those two clauses together, I should like to ask my honorable friend, who I know, if anybody, can explain it, how he maintains that bounty lands and sold lands are the same thing? The Senator's argument is, and that is the theory of this bill, that lands granted for bounties fall within the description in the compact of lands sold, the net proceeds of which were to be devoted, while in the same act, as it appears to me—I may be wrong—Congress regarded them as quite different things, and fixed one rule of taxation for one, and another rule of taxation for the other.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is very adroit, but if he will give me his attention for a moment while I answer his question I will try to do it as well as I can. Does it make any difference, so far as the time is concerned, whether the term is three years or five years as to the consideration between the Government and the State?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not on the point of consideration; I am on the point of description. The question is whether the bounty lands fall within the description, according to the meaning of this contract, of lands sold.

Mr. LOGAN. I will answer that, but I want to answer the question that is covered under it. The Senator is too good a lawyer not to know that the distinction between five years and three years, as to the consideration between the State and the Government, cuts no figure whatever. Whether the term is six months or ten years makes no difference. The question is whether the State withheld taxation that she was entitled to, and for that reason the Government agreed to certain propositions. That is the consideration, and it is not as to the time.

Now, I will answer the other question as to the difference between sold lands, as the Senator calls it, and lands taken by land warrants. Of course the land was the same; it could not affect the land. What did it affect. Could it affect the Government? If so, how? The effect upon the Government was the same thing precisely, and that was what the Government was aiming at, that her lands could not be taxed, that she might dispose of them and might afford greater inducements for parties to go and take these lands. Certainly the consideration was the same? That is the question the gentleman wants answered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh no; that is not the question.

Mr. LOGAN. Then, if that is not it, the question is, Was the payment the same? Is that it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; that is not it.

Mr. LOGAN. Then, what is it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The question is, is the description the same?

Mr. LOGAN. The description of what?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The description of the net proceeds of lands sold.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My question is this: How is it possible to maintain that Congress supposed that bounty lands were lands included within the description of the 5 per cent., which says the net proceeds of lands sold shall be paid out in such and such ways?

Mr. LOGAN. I will explain that if I can.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When it provided, if the Senator will allow me to state the question—

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When it provided that in the one case of lands sold one disposition should be made in respect of the States giving up taxation and in respect of bounty lands another disposition should be made.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, the Senator comes down to a nice point that can be answered, it seems to me, and it is in reference to the description or character of disposition by the Government; that is, that the lands are described one class as lands sold and the other as lands located with bounty land warrants. It is the description, then, that is applied to the purchase.

Of course at first the Government used the word "sales" because that was for the purpose of disposing of the lands, but as the Government was under obligation to pay a debt that it owed, and it could discharge that debt in land, having more land than it had money, it took it upon itself to discharge its debt in lands, and perhaps that because they expected that most of these land warrants would be in the hands of persons purchasing them, getting them at probably a smaller price than they would for the money, and because the land set apart as military land was selected out of the best lands. It was in regard to the selection of the military tract in my State they reduced the time of taxation in this particular. If that was not the reason I do not understand why; but so far as the distinction is concerned between the Government (and the Government is the one) I want the Senator to answer me if the Government owes him a million of dollars and discharges that debt with bounty land warrants, is the Government going to say that the land was sold and paid for in a different way from what it agreed, and therefore under no obligation to pay 5 per cent. and keep the compact? Is that the theory? Is that the honesty of this Government? Is that the manner in which this Government intends to keep its obligations? Is this Government to be made a quibbler here in reference to small amounts when dealing with great States from whom they have received the money for years that helped to support the Government?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator want an answer now, or at some other time?

Mr. LOGAN. I would just as lief have it now as at any other time if the Senator wants to give it now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will give it now. I agree with the Senator in his illustration that if the Government of the United States owes a debt and pays it, it has no right to say it has not paid it. That is plain enough; but the Government being the proprietor of lands over which the Territory that asks to be admitted as a State has no authority whatever, it has a right to make the compact with the State on coming in according to the terms that are agreeable to both of them and that they both agree to. If the Government says, therefore, in so many words, to the State when it comes in, "All the money that I get from the sales of these lands I will divide with you, but I reserve my dominion of proprietorship, and as a Government having citizens that I owe debts to and wish to confer benefits upon, I reserve my sovereign right not to sell these lands at all; my sovereign right is not to be given up, but whatever money I do get in the course of the policy that I pursue about my citizens I will divide with you"—I say in that case, if the Government does not choose to sell an acre of land, it is a perfectly fair bargain, and neither has a right to complain.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator says that is a fair bargain. Allow me to illustrate and see if it is. We will say that there were three States all having the same contract with the Government in regard to the lands that the Government owns within their borders. The contract is that when these lands are disposed of the Government will pay 5 per cent. to the States in consideration that the States will not tax the lands for five years after they are taken by the purchaser. The object of that of course we understand to be to induce settlement on these lands. When the Government has made that compact with three States, all upon the same basis precisely, suppose the Government has issued land warrants enough to take up all the lands in one of the States. A law is then passed that these land warrants shall not be located in two of the States, but shall be located in one particular State, say Illinois—Illinois, Michigan, and Indiana being the three States named. Hence by the land warrants they take every foot of land in Illinois, and they leave the land to be bought for cash in the other two States, and pay to the other two States the 5 per cent. on the sales, while the one State does not get a cent for the purpose of advancing its schools, &c. Would that be fair?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would not be fair, and then there would be a ground to appeal to Congress and say, "you, in the exercise of the sovereign dominion that you reserved, have thought it necessary to so shape your legislation, not for the purpose of grinding us but for the benefit of your soldiers, that the situation is entirely changed from what we supposed it was going to be. Now we appeal to your sense of equity and generosity, to make this thing right." The answer to that would be, if such an appeal were made in a given case, "I am willing to be equitable, I am willing to be generous," says the Government; "now, let us see what we have done for you; if we have not more than made it up in a great many ways we will make it up now." But the Senators from Iowa, whose State has the largest share in this, say, "we do not stand upon the general principles of what the Government ought to do as a matter of generosity and fair-dealing, but we stand upon the construction of the bargain that we made, and we are willing to fall by that or stand upon it." Then my answer would be, the bargain reserved this sovereign dominion and if you only stand upon the bargain you have nothing to say. If you appeal to our sense of generosity and fair-dealing, as between man and man, then we will take everything into consideration.

Mr. LOGAN. Now I will see whether the Senator should put it on the ground of generosity. He may put it upon any ground he may choose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am taking the construction of the Senators from Iowa.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand, it is not mine. My construction is as I have said and tried to maintain, however feebly I have done so—

Mr. EDMUNDS. You have done so ably.

Mr. LOGAN. My construction is, that the Government having made an agreement with the State that it should have 5 per cent. for its withholding taxation, and that that 5 per cent. should be used for the promotion of education and for internal improvements within the States, when the Government disposes of the land in discharge of its obligations and then denies the 5 per cent. to the State, it violates its agreement and does not act in good faith. As in the illustration I put, if three States, under the same contracts or compacts with the Government, make the same agreement that 5 per cent. shall be given to the States for these purposes, and if the Congress should pass a law that two of the States shall receive the 5 per cent. but that the other State shall be set apart to have its lands located with land warrants and shall not be paid the 5 per cent., it is a dishonest and unfair course on the part of the Government. It is taking the advantage of one State for the benefit of the others. The illustration fits here. In the very time when these lands were open in my State to be located with land scrip or warrants Congress did pass a law exempting the lands of some of the States from these land warrants, and put them on other States, which is just the very case that I have given. In Iowa, Illinois, and Missouri these land warrants were laid when other States by law were exempted from having their lands located or selected as soldiers' lands. Therefore, I say that if the Government claims that these lands were not sold within the meaning of this compact, it has acted not only in bad faith, but it was a trick on the part of the Government to have the lands of our State taken and pay nothing for it, and pay the 5 per cent. to the other States where they shoved the location out of their border on to us. That is the case presented here. The State of Michigan to-day receives her 5 per cent. on every acre of land. The law exempted her land from being taken in this way selected in payment to soldiers by the Government for services, and our State had to stand it. Was this within the meaning of the contract, and evidence of fair-dealing on the part of the Government?

In reference to this question I wish to ask the Senator from Vermont (because every one admits that he is not only an accomplished Senator but an astute lawyer) suppose I make a bargain with him to-day to pay him $10,000 in gold coin. My obligation is in writing; it is my agreement. Suppose when that obligation matures, he says, "LOGAN, I do not want the gold, I prefer the bonds of the Government of the United States." I obtain the bonds and pay them to him. Is not that a satisfaction of that obligation as much as if I had paid the gold? Will the Senator not say so?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly I would say so.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; suppose that in the obligation it was recited, "that if this obligation shall be faithfully complied with on the precise day as specified, then the interest on this obligation shall be reduced 2 per cent.;" and the party that is to receive the money prefers and agrees to the bond in place of the gold and I carry it out, will he not be as much under obligation to reduce the interest 2 per cent. as if I had paid the gold?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very likely.

Mr. LOGAN. If that be true, then tell me how it is when the Government of the United States agrees with my State that for every acre of land sold or disposed of within the borders of that State, if we abstain from taxation for five years and for three years respectively, it will give us 5 per cent. in consideration of that act, the Government can afterward come in and say: "We owe a debt to the soldiers who have performed service for the country; we will pay that debt with land instead of money, having more land than we have money." The soldier is willing to take the land. He does take it. It discharges the obligation of the Government. When the obligation of the Government is discharged, it says to the State of Illinois: "Well, I did not receive for the land that which was first intended, and therefore I will not pay you the 5 per cent."

Mr. EDMUNDS. My honorable friend from Illinois misses the point in stating his case, as it appears to me. We differ about that, but it seems so to me. Now, as I read this compact of the United States and the State of Illinois, both agreed that the United States had sovereign dominion over these lands.

Mr. LOGAN. There is no dispute about that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It said to the State of Illinois that was to come in, not bound to do anything for it, in the way of public lands, "in order to help education in your State and help the internal improvements, all the money that we get from the sales of land we will divide; we will appropriate 5 per cent. to help you, 3 per cent. of it shall be appropriated to your education, which you can dispose of as you like for those purposes, but we hand it over to you in trust, and 2 per cent. we will spend to help you in another way; but you must know at the same time"—which is my reading of these statutes—"that our political dominion"—of course, I do not mean party politics in the general sense, but our political dominion—"over this land for any purpose we think the public good requires us to dispose of them remains." If, therefore, it becomes desirable to give away a part of these lands to a railroad, to grant a part of them for a consideration for the building of a railroad for the carrying of the mails free, &c., or to pay soldiers, if you call it pay, or to give bounties to soldiers who have served and are already out of service, (a mere act of generosity, bear in mind,) it is part of the agreement that we may do that, and we must be governed, you being a part of the Government also, we must all be governed by the general principles of what seems to be fair about the disposition of these lands. We agree simply that all the money that we get under our system of public lands we will divide in such a way. If that was the bargain, then it is not inequitable to have the bargain carried out, because both parties understood what might be done.

Mr. LOGAN. What becomes, however, of the revenue of the State? If we have withheld the taxation and depleted our revenues so that we cannot carry on our educational purposes, and the Government still gets her benefits, does the fact that the Government has sovereign control of the lands entitle the Government to enforce our part of the contract and answer us, when we ask that it be enforced, with sovereignty over the public domain? According to the Senator's theory, because the bargain said money, nothing but money will do. Now, in answer to that, let me put a case according to the Senator's theory. He asks me here, as a Senator from Illinois, to agree that Illinois shall be treated differently from what other States have been having the same compact with the Government. If an Indian reservation—which is exactly following the line of his argument—is carved out of the public lands in my State and given to a tribe of Indians in lieu of lands that they hold in New York, for illustration, the consideration is the exchange of the land in Illinois for the land in New York, and according to the Senator's theory we should not be entitled to the 5 per cent. on that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly not.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator knows very well that the Government of the United States has paid Alabama, Mississippi, Missouri, and Indiana on that very principle.

Mr. McMILLAN. And Wisconsin.

Mr. LOGAN. And Wisconsin. On the very principle that I state in this case those States have received the 5 per cent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not on the "very principle."

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir, I say on the very principle under the laws of Congress, for under the law Alabama, and Mississippi, and Indiana, and Wisconsin, and Kansas I think latterly, have settled with the Government, and the Indian reservations taken out of their lands have been settled for at $1.25 an acre by the Government of the United States and the 5 per cent. paid.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; but the Senator says it is on the principle that is involved in this bill.

Mr. LOGAN. It is precisely the principle involved in this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I entirely deny; and if it were involved in such a principle then I should say that Congress had done a great act of injustice to all the States together in doing anything of the kind; but I thought the principle on which that thing proceeded was a principle of generosity.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A principle of generosity, a generous sense of what it should do; and, therefore, if it had conferred on other States benefits in a larger degree of the same general nature that the other States who had got these other benefits that the particular States had not, would have no right to complain. The Senator can cite a great many bad precedents undoubtedly.

Mr. LOGAN. I like to have precedents applied to my constituents as well as to others. Now, sir, when Congress steps in and settles with Alabama, pays her $120,000, as 5 per cent. on her Indian reservations that were not sold for cash, but were taken in exchange for other lands; pays Mississippi, pays Wisconsin, Missouri, Indiana, Kansas, and Nebraska, and because Illinois, forsooth, has no Indian reservations, but her lands have been taken with military land warrants, you say the same principle shall not apply because these lands were not sold. They were sold just as much as the Indian reservations were sold. The Indian reservations were carved out of the lands of the State, and taken in exchange for other lands belonging to the Indians. So, too, were the lands taken in these different States and given in exchange for land warrants, or for the satisfaction of the obligation of the Government to the soldier, the land warrant being the certificate of the performance of his services to the Government, a certificate to him that he was entitled to so much for his labor or his soldierly conduct in behalf of his country; and because the land warrants are given in exchange for the services of the soldier, the States are not entitled to be paid by the Government the 5 per cent., but the Indian land is to be paid for. I should like to know the distinction in principle.

The Senator from Vermont bases his whole argument upon the proposition that these lands were to be sold for cash, and the 5 per cent. applies only to the net proceeds of sales that are made for cash. And yet he is met in that argument with the thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars paid to nearly all the States, except Iowa and Illinois and one or two of the other States, for lands taken precisely on the same principle, and he says because a bad precedent was established in one case it should not be followed in another. It is not a bad precedent; it is an honest and just precedent. The Government agreed with the States that we should have this per cent. on these lands for certain purposes. Why did the Government do it. Sir, it is not necessary to describe the condition of our country at the time these compacts were made. The great Northwest then was the plain upon which the tramp of the Indian was heard; it was the plain of danger; it was far out—a dangerous country. The Government of the United States, to induce people to go and settle its lands, agreed with the States that it would do certain things. It agreed with them that the lands belonging to the Government within their jurisdiction should have 5 per cent. assessed upon their sales—that is, upon the benefit the Government derived from them—for educational purposes and for other purposes, and the States should withhold taxation. Why? Because people would more readily settle on lands that were exempt from taxation for five years after purchase than they would on any other lands, and this was a part of what entered into the agreement. After this agreement has been complied with strictly on the part of the States in every instance, for every one has kept its agreement strictly, the Government now comes up and says, "I am not bound by the compact; I will not keep it."

Mr. President, we have no complaint to make of bad treatment from our Government, but we do say that the Government of the United States has dealt differently with every State in this Union from what it has with the Western States. There never has been a claim made by a Southern State or by an Eastern State that stood upon the same basis of justice that this does which has not passed Congress. Not one. When two States came from the South first and asked that these Indian reservations be paid for at 5 per cent., rating them at $1.25 per acre, Congress passed it. So in reference to Missouri. Three acts passed in reference to these three States, and the other States have been paid on that basis, because that construction had been given to the compact by the act of Congress of 1857 in reference to the State of Mississippi.

Now, sir, it does seem to me that it does not come well from the Senators from the States which receive nothing as they say by this bill, States which have their own lands, States which received the money that was obtained by the sale of their own lands, to come now when the Government has in a great measure been supported by the sale of the lands in our States and deny us this pittance. Take the great State of Texas, large enough for four States. Every acre of land within her borders belongs to the State. She receives all the money that comes from the sale of her lands; and so with nearly all the old States, while millions and millions of dollars have been paid into the coffers of the Government from the sales of public lands in other States. Senators will answer me and say they were the lands of the Government. I admit it, but the Government made this compact in reference to them with these States, has sold the lands and in fact has been measurably supported in its expenses prior to the war by the sale of public lands. Take my own State to-day. A Senator talks about the taxation of the other States. I must say that I was a little surprised at the Senator from Vermont appealing to the Senators from other States here saying their States would be taxed to pay this money. Why, sir, the State of Illinois this day pays $16,000,000 per annum to the General Government in internal taxes. How much do we receive by this bill? Probably three or four hundred thousand dollars; and other States which do not pay the thousandth part as much as Illinois does will stand up here and complain that the Government will keep its compact with Illinois amounting to three or four hundred thousand dollars; you then talk about taxation, the very States that ask for this compact of the Government to be kept are the States in this Union to-day that pay taxes more heavily than any other States in the Union with one or two exceptions. To-day, sir, the State which I represent pays more money into the coffers of this Government from internal taxation than any other State in this Union.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean that that contribution is a taxation upon the people of his State?

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all directly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does he mean? I suppose he as a statesman must readily understand—I know he does—that the taxation derived from internal revenue, in the main is a tax on consumption; and if we secure from internal revenue in the State of Illinois a million dollars a year for whisky the people of Vermont drink the whisky and have to pay the tax.

Mr. LOGAN. It was not necessary for the Senator to say that, because the people of Vermont cannot drink all the whisky made in Illinois.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We do a good deal of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. I agree they are very good consumers, [laughter,] but at the same time they cannot consume it all by any means.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Somebody does.

Mr. LOGAN. But that is immaterial. I do not use this as an argument in favor of the bill—nearly all taxes are paid by the consumers finally—but I use it to meet not an argument but a fallacious assumption that was thrown into this debate in order to induce men in the Senate to vote against this proposition for fear their States would have to pay a part of this money. It is no argument in favor of the bill, but at the same time if it is no argument in favor of it, it is no argument against it; and when statesmen in this Chamber appeal to Senators that their States are going to be taxed, and when honorable Senators stand in the Senate Chamber and compute the amount their States are going to get, and say that the tax will amount to nearly as much as they get, and that the interest on these certificates will only amount to so much in so long a time, and therefore they cannot support it, I have no argument to answer any such suggestion as that.

I do not claim great statesmanship, but, sir, I do hope that I shall never grow to be a statesman who will use the argument before the American Congress that my State would pay five cents perhaps, and therefore cannot vote for a bill unless it shall get ten cents back.

No, Mr. President, this contract between the Government of the United States and these States was entered into in good faith, on the part of the people at that time desiring the growth of this country, desiring that it should be peopled, that it should grow into great States. These inducements were held out to get people to organize State governments. They did it, and at the door of this National Government for years back these States have asked that justice be done in reference to this particular thing; and it has been denied, because, forsooth, they say it will tax the people of this country! So does money appropriated for the purpose of dredging out a harbor which might be convenient to the constituency of some Senators and not of others. So does an appropriation for the great harbor of New York tax the people of this country. So does an appropriation for our lakes and our rivers tax the people of this country. But because, perhaps, one of the great arteries of this nation does not wend its way through some of the States, is that any reason why a general fund should not be taken for the purpose of opening up the highway? Is that the argument that is to be used in this Chamber? If so, then the doctrine of the rights of States has gone so far that no one can vote for any appropriation unless it applies peculiarly to his own State.

Sir, we, it seems to me, as an American people should look above and beyond this. This great country should be one country, one grand whole, where each and every man should be willing that his mite if necessary should be contributed for the general welfare, and that which is agreed to be honest and just between the Government and States, between individuals and individuals, should be kept sacred and considered binding. Good faith should be carried out on the part of all, and then there will be no reason for complaint. Each and every compact with a State should be kept in the most implicit good faith; everything pertaining to the welfare of the people should be faithfully fulfilled, and our arguments, in my judgment, should be in that direction which would benefit the whole—not that "my State will not be benefited if this thing is done for the East or for the South, but the whole country will receive the benefit." So, too, in carrying out agreements and contracts, if they are honest and just we should all say, "let them be carried out;" whether they benefit my State directly or not is immaterial; if the faith of the Government is pledged let the faith of the Government be kept.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Tennessee to give way one moment.

Mr. HARRIS. Very well.

Mr. ALLISON. We are not making much progress with this bill, but I want to have it understood that this bill shall proceed in the regular way until disposed of, notwithstanding the notice given by the Senator from Ohio the other day in reference to the Geneva award bill. I only want that understood, so that if we may go into executive session at this hour, it shall not interfere with the progress of this bill.

Mr. BECK. Let us vote now.

Mr. ALLISON. I am ready to vote on it.

Mr. HARRIS. My motion is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. Of course that does not interfere with the pendency of the present bill.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President—

Mr. HARRIS. I withdraw the motion for a moment for the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. RANDOLPH. In the early part of the session to-day I introduced an order, and I ask that that order be taken up and acted on by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the proposition?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the following order proposed by Mr. RANDOLPH:

Ordered, That Senate bill No. 1139, for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, be made the special order of the Senate, to follow immediately upon the completion of the pending unfinished business.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I will say in reference to that, that this order puts in explicit form that which has been understood day after day for many days in the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am always, except in some very extreme emergency, opposed to any special orders whatever; but I have not the slightest objection to the thing taking place that the Senator desires unless it should happen that a deficiency bill should come over from the House to be acted on for the payment of marshals who it appears are never to be paid at all and who have been carrying on the judicial branch of the Government at their own expense now for eight months.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I am very glad we have such officers. I will say, Mr. President, that it was understood this morning that the appropriation bills should of course take precedence; and I understand under the rules of the Senate they do at any rate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to taking up the order of the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. EDMUNDS. My observation has led me to think that special orders are not good things. At the same time I wish to say to the Senator from New Jersey that so far as I am concerned I shall vote with him to take up the matter that he refers to immediately that this bill is disposed of, unless some extreme emergency that I cannot foresee arises or an appropriation bill shall be on foot, in which case I should object. I hope, therefore, the Senator will not press this as a special order which I do not believe in, but will have a general understanding (which I am quite willing to agree to) that except in the event named, the matter that he refers to shall come up next.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I shall have no objection of course if that understanding can be continued; but as I have repeatedly said within the last eight or ten days, ever since the special order was first had, I am anxious to secure action on the bill I have more particularly in charge. Now, at the close of the week I want it understood, so that there shall be no misapprehension or misunderstanding between myself and the Senator from Ohio who has been absent all day, and who gave notice the other day that on Tuesday next he would move to take up the Geneva award bill. I then said to him that I would have to oppose it. It was left in that condition, a condition of uncertainty. It was because I wanted to have something understood thoroughly on all sides that I introduced the order which is now the subject of discussion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg leave to suggest to my friend from New Jersey that he ask the Chair to inquire whether there shall be a general understanding that, except as against an appropriation bill, the Fitz-John Porter matter shall come up immediately on this bill being disposed of.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the Chair puts that question, in order that I may know how to answer it, I should like to inquire what is the particular reason for considering the Fitz-John Porter case, so called, a little sooner or a little later? Of course it ought to be considered; but what is the particular reason for a special time?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Answering the Senator from New York, there are many reasons that operate upon me personally; but the public reasons perhaps can be briefly stated. This case has been before the Senate eleven months. It therefore has some right because of its priority over other cases that have been considered. I need not add that the case has been under consideration in other ways for a very long number of years. I do not care now to go into other reasons nor to touch the merits of the case.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, some time ago inquiry was made in the Senate very early one morning, during I think the first four or five minutes of the daily session when I happened not to be in my seat, why the Geneva award bill, so called, had not been proceeded with. A member of the Senate, with no doubt the most innocent if not the best intentions in the world, made a statement which conveyed to a good many people the idea that in some way or other I was responsible, more or less, for what was deemed in some quarters a belated consideration of the Geneva award bill. I had never then, and I have never since, delayed the consideration of the Geneva award, either in any committee, or in the Senate, or in any other place one moment. Subsequently a report was made touching the Geneva award and the distinguished Senator from Illinois now before me [Mr. DAVIS] delivered to the Senate a very able and instructive speech, as I thought, in regard to it. Having been so far considered, it was laid down in order that the Senate might proceed to deal with the urgent obligations of the so-called compact upon which the other Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] so ably addressed the Senate to-day. That is the last we heard of the Geneva award bill. This bill relating to Mr. Porter has never been taken up.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I understood the Senator from New Jersey gave way to this 5 per cent. bill, which was temporarily laid aside to allow me to be heard on the Geneva award bill; and immediately afterward this bill was again taken up.

Mr. CONKLING. The honorable Senator from Illinois very justly corrects my form of statement. He says the Geneva award bill was taken up after this so-called 5 per cent. bill had been moved, which latter bill was laid aside to enable the honorable Senator himself to address the Senate. That is true. It is also true, however, that the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, having the Geneva award bill in charge, gave then in advance notice that he should move to press the Geneva award bill. He has repeated that notice since to be operative immediately when this great measure of justice to certain neglected States, in which my friend from Illinois takes so much interest, should be disposed of. Now comes the Senator from New Jersey and proposes to follow this with a bill, which has never been taken up at all, and as to which I say frankly I did not know and do not know now after hearing him that there is any special exigency of haste. I do not see how its consideration one week sooner or one week later affects any matters to which our attention has been called. The Senator from New Jersey proposes that that shall supersede the Geneva award bill and everything else excepting an appropriation bill, and that unanimous consent shall be given to that.

I regret that I have found an objection as to the honorable Senator from Ohio like that which he found in respect of me during about two minutes at the opening of the session one morning—he is not in his seat, I observe, and the last thing in the world I want to intimate is that the Geneva award bill is suffering on his account or that any delay is likely to occur. But in his absence I venture to say that I do not see why, against that bill which has been pending in some form before one or both Houses of Congress for now several years, consent should be given that any other business should be taken up; and I cannot doubt that if the honorable Senator from Ohio were here, vigilant as I know he is touching the Geneva award at all times, he would with great vigor put in a claim for precedence for that bill.

The honorable Senator from New Jersey says that he mentioned this morning that he would do this; be it so. I think I have detained the Senate to enable the Senator from Ohio to come in, as long as it befits me to do; and as I do not see him approaching his seat, I am afraid I shall have to allow the Senator from New Jersey to prevail, if he can, with the Senate.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The Senator from New York will allow me to say that I sought no advantage of the absence of the Senator from Ohio. I have sent for him and have endeavored to find him, and I had no desire to press the motion until his arrival, but I was compelled to take some action because of the motion of the Senator from Tennessee that we proceed to the consideration of executive business, after which, the doors being closed, I could not very well press the motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We can settle it afterward just as well.

Mr. BAYARD. Was the motion of the honorable Senator from New Jersey acceded to by the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was not.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask what is its position before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been taken up.

Mr. BAYARD. The honorable Senator desires that it should be understood, or an order be made by the Senator to secure the fact, that after the pending order is decided, the question of the 5 per cent. claim of certain States, the bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter shall become the special order of the Senate. Has that been objected to?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I certainly shall object to it until the Senator from Ohio has an opportunity to be heard. I think the Geneva award bill should be disposed of first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unanimous consent is not given to the proposition of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HARRIS. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EATON. I would suggest to my friend from New Jersey that this matter can be attended to after the executive session is ordered, and the doors can be considered open for the purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. While the doors are being closed I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Tuesday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope not.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania to modify his motion by providing that we meet on Monday next, instead of Tuesday.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Sunday is the 22d of February.

Mr. HARRIS. So I understand.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. And Sunday cannot very well be celebrated as the people would like to celebrate the anniversary of the birth of Washington.

Mr. HARRIS. I move to amend the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, if it is amendable, by striking out "Tuesday" and inserting "Monday," so that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next instead of Tuesday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Tuesday of next week. The Senator from Tennessee moves to amend the motion by striking out "Tuesday" and inserting in lieu thereof "Monday." The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 25, noes 15.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the motion as amended, that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It cannot be withdrawn; it has been amended.

Mr. BECK. Why not sit to-morrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion as amended, that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-three minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

RELIEF OF COLORED EMIGRANTS.

Mr. MORRILL. I have the unanimous consent of the members of the Committee on Finance who are present to report back without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 3288) for the relief of colored emigrants, which was referred to that committee, and I ask the Senate to consider it at this time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all clothing and other articles, being charitable contributions or the avails of charitable contributions, imported in good faith for the relief or aid of colored persons who may have emigrated from their homes to other States, and not for sale, and all such articles imported and now in bond, shall be admitted free of duty under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That such articles shall be delivered only to State or municipal corporations, or to some society or institution established for charitable purposes: And provided further, That the importers or consignees of such articles shall give such security as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe for the payment of lawful duties on such articles, should any of them be sold or used contrary to the provisions and intent of this act. This act shall take effect from its passage, and remain in force until February 1, 1881.

Passed the House of Representatives February 10, 1880.

Attest:

GEORGE M. ADAMS, Clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to taking up the bill?

Mr. PENDLETON. I object to it.

Mr. VOORHEES. I object.

Mr. THURMAN. May I inquire how the bill just read comes up? I hope that bill will not be passed just now.

Mr. VOORHEES. It cannot be passed now.

Mr. THURMAN. If the people who live abroad interfere with the migration of persons from one State to another in the United States, or, as this bill has it, the migration of colored people from one State to another, I should like to have that matter very fairly and fully considered before the American people. There was migration to my State when every man carried his life in his hands, because he did not know but what an Indian would seek to take his scalp.

Mr. WITHERS. Let me suggest that objection has been made and the bill has gone over.

Mr. VOORHEES. Under objection it will go on the Calendar as any other bill.

Mr. THURMAN. Then let it be objected to.

Mr. VOORHEES. It has been objected to.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to say one word in reply to the Senator from Ohio as he has not been in the Senate Chamber during the whole day. This bill was reported to-day by the Committee on Finance by the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] and on motion the doors were opened to proceed, if the Senate would, to consider it. That motion having been made, a Senator, if I mistake not the Senator from Ohio nearest me [Mr. PENDLETON] objected; and he objected I suppose on the ground that having been reported to-day the bill can be considered to-day only by unanimous consent. It is in the power of that Senator or any another, of course, to interpose effectually that objection.

But now as I have the opportunity for a moment to do so, I beg to state how this bill came to be reported to-day. It was upon my application made to the Senator from Vermont. He was kind enough to bring it to the notice specially of the Committee on Finance, and he stated in making the report that it was by the unanimous assent of all the members of the committee present if I understood him aright. Am I right in that?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, my application in this behalf was made because I have at this moment in my hand a telegraphic dispatch from a charitable and prominent citizen of the city of New York stating that thirty packages of clothing for Kansas refugees, given by friends in England and brought here free, have been received. He then refers to this bill which has passed the House, and asks whether it cannot be expedited on its passage here.

That is the bill and that is the occasion of which the honorable Senator from Ohio the senior Senator [Mr. THURMAN] has felt moved to make the observations which have fallen from him. I trust he will take no offense and ascribe no unkindness to me if in reply I say thus much. Charitable persons in England, moved by a sense of pity for the starving and the poor have sent at their own cost to us a quantity of clothing to cover and shelter them. The Senator from Ohio objects to even considering a proposition to allow this charity to reach its destination; and he does that in the same Chamber in which by unanimous consent we have very recently adopted a joint resolution to send across the sea to the starving people of Ireland contributions given by the charity of our own people. So that here stand the two facts and the two spectacles in contrast with each other, that charitable people in Great Britain moved by charity send to a class of our people who are suffering clothing and raiment, and send this charity, to men born here, citizens of the United States, and to women and children born here, and the Senator refuses to allow the Senate to even consider the question whether we will permit the reception and application of this clothing. Our citizens, in the midst of considerable need of our own, send food and send raiment to the suffering people of other lands, and I think no member of any body, no official, has been found in England to object to receiving and applying what we have sent there.

It seems to me, Mr. President, very hard that this should be so. I almost think if the honorable Senator from Ohio would reflect upon it he would scarcely feel moved to refuse to consider whether he will allow to perish and go for naught these contributions lying on the wharf in the city of New York or whether he will allow them to be sent on, not at his expense, not at the expense of the Government, but at the cost of the charitable people who chose to forward them, for the use of those people for whom they were designed.

Mr. BRUCE rose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the pending question, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no question.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent the Senator from New York was permitted to make the remarks which he has made. The Senator from Mississippi now addresses the Chair.

Mr. BRUCE. It is not my purpose to discuss this question. I have studiously avoided giving expression to any views on this floor touching the movement of colored people from the South, and I have hoped no occasion would arise for me to engage in that discussion. I shall not do so now.

It seems to me that the only question involved now is whether or not we will relieve suffering humanity; whether we will allow these people who are in Kansas—whether they have left their homes for cause or without cause, wisely or unwisely, is a matter of no importance, so far as this question is concerned—to die by hundreds, rather than permit a charity which the English people have sent here to pass through the custom-house free of duty. That is all. Money is being collected in this country by thousands of dollars to be sent across the seas to relieve the suffering people of Ireland. It is right—

Mr. FERRY. Hundreds of thousands.

Mr. BRUCE. Yes, hundreds of thousands. I am glad to say I have been one of the persons who have contributed. Nobody up to this moment I believe has objected to this money being sent; and, if I mistake not, two or three days ago, a joint resolution was introduced, and on the next day reported and passed without a dissenting vote, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to fit up a ship and use that ship in carrying provisions and clothing to those suffering people.

Now, I do not believe that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] desires to be understood as opposing a movement simply to relieve these suffering people. It is not now a question of how they came there or why they went there; it is not a question whether they ought to have gone there or not; but they are there and they are in distress, and it seems to me that the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] whom I know well and favorably, does not intend to antagonize this bill because he may not believe, as many of us may not believe, that these people should have originally gone to that State.

In the name of the hundreds of colored people now starving in Kansas I appeal to the Senate to pass the pending measure, that they may receive the immediate benefits of this charity.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I concurred, as one of the Committee on Finance, in reporting this bill favorably and uniting in the request that it be acted on and passed now. I think—

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the Senator goes on, as there is no question before the Senate, I want to repeat what my colleague said; that is, to ask unanimous consent that this bill be now considered.

Mr. KERNAN. That is what I was going to ask after saying a word or two. I hope there will be no objection, but that we shall consider and pass it now.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I interposed an objection to the present consideration of the bill. I did it for the reason stated by the Senator from Vermont who is farthest from me, [Mr. MORRILL,] that the Committee on Finance had unanimously agreed to it at their session this morning; and from the time—

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator is mistaken. I did not say their session this morning.

Mr. PENDLETON. I certainly do not desire to misunderstand the Senator or to misrepresent him. I so understood him.

Mr. MORRILL. No; my statement was that I had the consent on the floor of the members of the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I want to know before this debate goes any further—

Mr. PENDLETON. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to know whether the bill is up or not?

Mr. KERNAN. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. PENDLETON. I object to the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to a question of order then.

Mr. PENDLETON. If I am not to be allowed to give my reason for objecting, I object now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the bill will go on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then let there be no further debate.

Mr. KERNAN. I simply wanted to say—

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the regular order if we cannot have the bill up.

Mr. KERNAN. I hope we shall not tax charity that comes into our country to relieve any portion of our people who are suffering.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Regular order.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I move that all prior orders of business be laid aside temporarily, and that we proceed to act on this bill now. I make that motion.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection is withdrawn.

Mr. KERNAN. Then I simply want to say in a very few words—

Mr. CONKLING. Is the bill before the Senate now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will ask if there is any objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. I say yes; I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes on the Calendar.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not mean by my objection to antagonize the bill on its passage; but—

Mr. EDMUNDS. No more debate. I must call the Senate to order.

Mr. VOORHEES. The gentleman will have the full benefit of my objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call the Senator to order now. The bill is not before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes on the Calendar.

Mr. WITHERS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and forty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 20, 1880.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, on behalf of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. DIBRELL,] asks that W. A. Cheatham, of Nashville, Tennessee, be allowed the privilege of the floor to-day.

There being no objection, the request was granted.

LIGHT-HOUSE ON GOOSE HILL FLATS, JAMES RIVER, VIRGINIA.

Mr. JOHNSTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4597) to provide for the erection of a light-house on Goose Hill Flats, James River, Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

VICKSBURG AND MERIDIAN RAILROAD.

Mr. CHALMERS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4598) to relieve the Vicksburg and Meridian Railroad Company from the payment of certain internal-revenue taxes erroneously assessed; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. ELLIS, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Pacific Railroads a bill (H. R. No. 4599) to amend and re-enact section 22 of an act approved March 3, 1871, entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, to aid the construction of its road, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

REMISSION OF LEGACY TAX.

Mr. McCOID, from the Committee on Manufactures, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. No. 2975) to repeal section 17 of the act of June 14, 1870, and chapter 10, title 35, of the Revised Statutes of 1878, and to remit taxes and penalties thereunder; which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McCOID also, by unanimous consent, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Iowa in reference to remitting and abating the internal-revenue legacy tax; which was referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD. It is as follows:

Whereas the General Government in the year 1864 passed a law requiring the payment of a 1 per cent. revenue tax on all legacies thereafter due; and

Whereas that during the time that said law was in force a great many estates have been settled up by administrators, guardians, and others, who were liable for said tax without any knowledge of the existence of such a law; and

Whereas the said tax that is now claimed to be due is from parties scattered over the entire country, north, south, east, and west, many of whom are dead, or, if living, unable to pay the same; and

Whereas the expense attending the collection of this tax, scattered as it is in small amounts over the country, will leave no margin to the Government, but if any it will be so small as to be no compensation for the annoyance, trouble, and expense it gives the people; and

Whereas there is now pending in Congress a bill, the purpose of which is to retire said tax, together with all penalties due or to become due: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their influence to secure the passage of said bill at as early a time as possible, to the end that the people may be saved from unnecessary trouble and expense in litigations that would arise, and that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each of our Representatives.

Approved February 14, 1880.

ENGRAVED SIGNATURES ON BANK NOTES.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4600) to prohibit engraved signatures upon national-bank notes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

DISCRIMINATIONS AND OVERCHARGES BY RAILROAD COMPANIES.

Mr. PRICE also, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Iowa, asking for the passage of a law to control railroad corporations so as to prevent unjust discrimination and excessive charges; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

DES MOINES RIVER LANDS.

Mr. PRICE also, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Iowa, relating to the Des Moines River lands; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPEAL OF LEGACY TAX.

Mr. PRICE also, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial and joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa, in favor of the repeal of the legacy tax; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SAMUEL HENDERSON.

Mr. BENNETT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4601) granting a pension to Samuel Henderson, of Springfield, Dakota Territory; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HOMESTEAD SETTLERS.

Mr. WASHBURN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4602) to equalize the rights of homestead settlers upon public lands within railroad limits; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

AGNES W. HILLS.

Mr. BROWNE, by unanimous consent, reported back, from the Committee on Military Affairs, the bill (H. R. No. 1821) for the relief of Agnes W. Hills; when the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the same, and the bill was referred to the Committee on War Claims, not to come back on a motion to reconsider.

J. K. SMITH.

Mr. MARTIN, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4603) for the relief of J. K. Smith, of North Carolina; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

SAINT JOSEPH AND DENVER CITY RAILROAD.

Mr. HUNTON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be respectfully requested to furnish for the use of the House the amount of subsidy in land granted the Saint Joseph and Denver City Railroad, together with all information as to what disposition has been made and is now being made of said land grant, and why said road has not been completed to a junction with the Union Pacific Railroad at Kearney, Nebraska, according to the survey of said road now on file in the Interior Department.

PAPER AND PAPER MATERIALS.

Mr. STEVENSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4604) to place certain articles imported and used in the manufacture of paper, and unsized printing-paper used exclusively for newspapers, pamphlets, and magazines, on the free list; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES B. MEYER.

On motion of Mr. CARLISLE, by unanimous consent, the Committee of Ways and Means was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Charles B. Meyer, asking for relief for loss of distillery illegally seized; and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

CLERK FOR INTEROCEANIC CANAL COMMITTEE.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, the Committee of Accounts have instructed me to report back a substitute for the resolution referred to them providing for clerk, stenographer, &c., for the Select Committee on the Interoceanic Canal.

The SPEAKER. The substitute will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the select committee on the subject of the interoceanic canal, and other proposed communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, be, and are hereby, authorized to employ a clerk, who shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the same rate per diem allowed to the clerks of the other committees of the House, and during the sessions of Congress only.

Mr. COX. I ask to amend the substitute in one particular.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield for that purpose?

Mr. MORSE. I do not know what it is.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will hear me, I think he will not object to the amendment I propose to offer.

Mr. SAMFORD. Is it open to objection?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserves his right.

Mr. COX. I move to amend by adding also a messenger for the Foreign Affairs Committee, who shall act as clerk, and I will give my reasons to my friend. The Committee on Foreign Affairs have had their property stolen for the last three weeks out of their room. All the little personal property in the room has been stolen. An attempt was made the other night to break open the desk of one of our members where the Acklen testimony was placed. We have now no protection there. We have no messenger at the door while we are in session. Three committees have been meeting in that room, and we are utterly without any guard. I sent this matter before the Committee of Accounts, but they have not acted on it, and I ask now the House will protect the property which belongs to the Government.

The SPEAKER. That will be done by the watchman.

Mr. COX. I move that amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield for that purpose?

Mr. MORSE. I do not; but demand the previous question?

Mr. ATKINS. I ask to have the resolution again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. ATKINS. Is it a report from the Committee of Accounts?

The SPEAKER. It is. The Committee of Accounts report that as a substitute for the original proposition which embraced "stenographer" as well as "clerk."

Mr. ATKINS. Is it subject to the point of order?

Mr. COX. If the previous question is voted down, cannot I move the amendment?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order then to move the amendment, but the gentleman from Massachusetts declines to yield.

Mr. COX. Then I hope the previous question will be voted down. It is absolutely necessary the Committee on Foreign Affairs should have what I ask.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 21, noes 22.

Mr. SPARKS. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests to the gentleman to offer his proposition separately.

Mr. COX. I did offer a resolution and sent it to the Committee of Accounts, but I can get no report from that committee. If this matter had been attended to two weeks before when I offered it, we would have saved $50 in property.

Mr. MORSE. I assure the gentleman that he shall have a report on his case, but I cannot yield to his amendment to the report of the Committee of Accounts.

No quorum having voted, the Speaker appointed Mr. MORSE and Mr. COX as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 29, noes 58.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman to accept my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no power to accept it. The House must vote on it.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Is it in order to demand the regular order?

Mr. COX. It is too late to make that point.

The SPEAKER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. SPARKS. I made it in the beginning.

The SPEAKER. There is no quorum.

Mr. COX. Did anybody make the point?

Mr. SPARKS. I did.

The SPEAKER. Two gentlemen made it.

Mr. MORSE. I will withdraw the report for the present.

The SPEAKER. The report is withdrawn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. VAN AERNAM, for one week.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that Charles

Fargo, a prominent business man of Chicago, be admitted to the privileges of the floor during the day.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. SIMONTON. I ask unanimous consent that Hon. Samuel P. Rose, of Colorado, be admitted to the privileges of the floor to-day and to-morrow.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MEXICAN VETERAN ASSOCIATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following communication:

NORFOLK AND PORTSMOUTH MEXICAN VETERAN ASSOCIATION.
(Organized 1873.)

NORFOLK, VIRGINIA, February 12, 1880.

HONORABLE SIR: In accordance with resolution, I am directed by the Mexican Veteran Association of this city to respectfully extend an invitation to yourself, and through you to the honorable body over which you preside, to be present in this city on the 23d instant at the ceremonies to be held in honor of Washington's birthday, the anniversary of the battle of Buena Vista, and the occasion of the national convention of the survivors of the Mexican war.

Respectfully and truly yours,

JAMES F. MILLIGAN,

President Norfolk and Portsmouth Veteran Association.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Speaker House of Representatives.

SAINT ANN'S INFANT ASYLUM.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, recommending an appropriation of $5,000 for Saint Ann's Infant Asylum; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RINGGOLD BARRACKS, TEXAS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to the purchase of Ringgold Barracks, in Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

G. T. A. NIXON.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting petition of Private G. T. A. Nixon, Company H, Fifth Cavalry, to be retired; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ROBERT S. WYLD.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, relative to the application of Robert S. Wyld for the reissue of certain bonds belonging to him, alleged to have been stolen or destroyed; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

INDIAN DEPREDAATION CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House letters from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting papers in the Indian depredation claims of Charles N. Emery, James A. J. and Joseph H. McVay, and others; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, relative to pleuro-pneumonia in neat cattle; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

DES MOINES RIVER LANDS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, relative to the Des Moines River lands; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

GEORGE WILLIAMS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in reply to resolutions of the House of January 14 and 20, 1880, transmitting papers in the case of George Williams; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

ASSAY COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the annual report of the assay commission; which was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. I ask that this communication be printed.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

WIDOW OF THE LATE A. M. LAY.

Mr. PHILIPS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be instructed to include in the sundry civil appropriation bill the sum of $6,000, for the benefit of the widow of Hon. A. M. Lay, deceased, late a member of the Forty-sixth Congress.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 157) for the relief of M. M. Herr, and to pay three messengers of the Senate;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 200) for printing the eulogies delivered in the Senate and House of Representatives upon Hon. Rush Clark, deceased; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 203) making appropriations for the Reform School of the District of Columbia.

OBSERVANCE OF INDIAN TREATY STIPULATIONS.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I present a memorial, signed by some 13,000 citizens of Pennsylvania, asking that in our dealings with the Indians treaty stipulations shall be respected; and I ask that the memorial, without the names of the signers, and also the explanatory note accompanying it, be printed in the RECORD. I do not ask that the names of the signers of the memorial be printed, but simply the body of the petition and the accompanying paper.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The petition is as follows:

To the President of the United States and to the Senate and House of Representatives:

We the undersigned men and women of the United States, resident in or near Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, do most respectfully but most earnestly request the President and the Houses of Congress to take all needful steps to prevent the encroachments of white settlers upon the Indian Territory, and to guard the Indians in the enjoyment of all the rights which have been guaranteed to them on the faith of the nation.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The accompanying memorial had its origin in a strong feeling of loyalty to treaties. It commenced with individuals, and spread to towns, cities, and States. On it are names of thinkers and molders, who feel it a right and a duty to express their sentiments when a public interest demands it.

We do not wish to clog the wheels of Government. We suggest no policy to it. We only wish to express our sense of the moral obligation of a treaty, whether the treaty be between the strong and the strong or between the strong and the weak, or for our advantage or disadvantage.

It is said that the Duke of Burgundy, a pupil of Fenelon, in a cabinet council, after hearing the reasons of state offered in abundance for violating a treaty which it was thought would be of great advantage to France, placed his hand upon the instrument and said, with emphasis, "Gentlemen, there is a treaty."

We would express that when a treaty is changed or modified the free consent of both parties is necessary. We pray that no consideration of interest, no pressure, no combination of difficulties which may arise shall influence our Government to depart from this law of treaties.

We are especially urgent in this case because we are strong and the Indians are weak. Our greater knowledge and power and our relations to the Indians give impenitence to our obligations.

We cannot afford to seem unjust. The eyes of the world are upon us. The eyes of Him who "executed righteousness and judgment for all that are oppressed" are upon us. We live also under the law of the harvest; as we sow, so also shall we reap. If we sow justice we shall reap justice; if we sow injustice we shall reap injustice.

Therefore, as citizens of this Republic, who have as individuals obligations to the Republic, we take this method—the only one known to us—of expressing our deep conviction of the moral obligations of a treaty.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

Mr. LORING. Mr. Speaker, I present the following petition, and ask that the body of it be printed in the RECORD. It is a short memorial.

The SPEAKER. The title of the memorial will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Petition of the Massachusetts Woman Suffrage Association, for such legislation as will secure a peaceful adjustment of presidential controversies.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the printing of the petition in the RECORD? The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEELE. I object.

The SPEAKER. It is not a question of female suffrage, but an appeal to the House to enact a law in reference to counting the electoral vote.

Mr. STEELE. I believe I will insist upon my objection anyhow.

Mr. LORING. Then I ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The petition was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DANIEL A. GIBBEY.

Mr. GILLETTE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1494) granting a pension to Daniel A. Gibbey, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims, not to come back on a motion to reconsider.

The motion was agreed to.

EDWARD P. VOLLUM.

On motion of Mr. CLARDY, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 296) for the relief of Edward P. Vollum was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, not to come back on a motion to reconsider.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FARR. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move to suspend the rules and dispense with the morning hour, so that we may proceed with the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CONGER. Is the motion to suspend the rules in order?

The SPEAKER. The motion to dispense with the morning hour is in order, but it requires a two-thirds vote.

Mr. CONGER. This is private bill day.

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of an argument why this should not be done. The rule says that the morning hour for the call of committees for reports shall not be dispensed with except by a two-thirds vote, and it may be dispensed with to-day by that vote.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BRIGHT. I have only risen to make a parliamentary inquiry as to the effect of the motion, whether it extends further than to dispense with the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It can do no more than dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is the only motion that is submitted.

Mr. CONGER. But the effect of it would be—

The SPEAKER. The effect of the motion, if adopted, would be to dispense with the morning hour; and the Chair supposes the gentleman from Kentucky, when the proper time arrived for a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, would raise the question of consideration.

Mr. McMAHON. And that would only require a majority vote?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

The question being taken on the motion to dispense with the morning hour, there were—ayes 90, noes 65.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CONGER and Mr. BLACKBURN were appointed.

Mr. GARFIELD. What is the object of the motion?

The SPEAKER. The object is that the House may go into Committee of the Whole to consider the rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us do that.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 97, noes 55. So (two-thirds not voting in the affirmative) the morning hour was not dispensed with.

MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty-two minutes to one o'clock, and, this being Friday, reports from committees of a private nature are in order. The call rests with the Committee on Military Affairs.

MARTIN L. BUNDY.

Mr. BROWNE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 3273) for the relief of Martin L. Bundy; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARK WALKER.

Mr. LE FEVRE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 249) for the relief of Mark Walker; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. WHITTHORNE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back, with adverse recommendations, the following petition and bill; and the same were laid upon the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

The petition of Andrew Jones, praying for the allowance of a claim in his favor against the Government; and

The bill (H. R. No. 985) for the relief of Joseph Sawyer.

Mr. WHITTHORNE moved to reconsider the votes by which the above petition and bill were laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JACOB DUNDORÉ.

Mr. WHITTHORNE also, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3747) for the relief of Jacob Dundore for the loss of the barge T. C. Zulick while in the service of the United States under charter-party, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The motion was agreed to.

R. G. COMBS AND OTHERS.

Mr. WHITTHORNE also, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3698) for the relief of R. G. Combs and others; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

MRS. FANNY S. CONWAY.

Mr. WHITTHORNE also, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1553) for the relief of Mrs. Fanny S. Conway, of Louisville, Kentucky; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. ELIZABETH P. PAGE.

Mr. GOODE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1902) for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth P. Page; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. BREWER. I desire to have the views of the minority printed with the report of the majority.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

JOHN S. CUNNINGHAM.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4605) for the relief of John S. Cunningham; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF LANGLEY B. CULLEY.

Mr. TALBOTT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 3826) for the relief of the heirs of the late Langley B. Culley; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DRS. THOMAS OWENS AND WILLIAM MARTIN.

Mr. TALBOTT also, from the same committee, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 2871 a bill (H. R. No. 4606) authorizing the President to appoint Drs. Thomas Owens and William Martin assistant surgeons in the United States Navy, not in the line of promotion; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. TALBOTT. I desire that this bill may be considered at the present time, and will ask that the report of the Committee be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred House bill No. 2871, authorizing the President to appoint Drs. Thomas Owens and William Martin assistant surgeons in the United States Navy, not in the line of promotion, have had the same under consideration and submit the following report, namely:

Your committee find from the papers and records furnished from the Navy Department that the said Dr. Thomas Owens entered the Navy as acting assistant surgeon A. D. 1864, and was assigned to duty on board of the iron-clad ram Atlanta stationed at Dutch Gap Canal, James River; and further find that he contracted on said station malarial habit, which, instead of developing into either of the types of that disease, manifested itself into a periodical neuralgia, influenced in assuming this form (neuralgia) by the character of the ship.

Your committee also find that said condition of the said Dr. Owens continued up to about the month of March, A. D. 1879, without his being totally incapacitated for duty, when he was seized with a paroxysm of fever and ague contracted while on duty at the navy-yard in Washington, District of Columbia, which aggravated and produced constant suffering; that under the act of Congress approved February 15, 1879, abolishing the volunteer navy, he was found "physically disqualified by disease occurring in the line of duty by the medical examining board created thereby and by the retiring board as unfit then for active service from disease occurring in the line of duty," but was mustered out of the service on or about the 30th of June, 1879; that three days prior to being mustered out the naval medical examining board reported to the honorable Secretary of the Navy that the said Owens should be placed on the active list as assistant surgeon not in the line of promotion; said examining board also reported that said Dr. Owens was suffering from sickness which was contracted while on duty in the service, and made said report because in their judgment they believed he would be able for duty at some future time.

Your committee further report that said Dr. Owens was attended professionally by Medical Inspector Philip S. Wales, United States Navy, who reported that said Dr. Owens was suffering with malarial disease, and recommended a change of climate.

Your committee further report that under the act of February 15, 1879, to abolish the volunteer navy, the Secretary of the Navy has the authority to place the said Dr. Owens upon the retired list but not the authority to appoint him to the service upon the active list, not in the line of promotion, as recommended by the board of medical examiners, and further report that the recommendation of the board of examiners is approved by the Secretary of the Navy, who recommends favorable action by Congress.

Your committee beg leave to call the attention of the House to the exhibits returned herewith, namely, the report of medical examining board and the letter of the honorable Secretary of the Navy, dated January 27, 1880.

Your committee also refer the House in the case of Dr. William Martin to the exhibits returned herewith, namely, the letter of the honorable Secretary of the Navy and the report of the medical examining board, which they respectfully submit as their report in his case.

Your committee recommends the adoption of this report and the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. TALBOTT. I will ask that the letter from the Secretary of the Navy be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 27, 1880.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 26th instant, requesting my opinion in the cases of Drs. Owens and Martin, to accompany the papers called for in your communication of the 14th instant, I have the honor to refer to Department's letter transmitted to you yesterday, and to add thereto that I approve the recommendation of the examining board, "that Dr. Thomas Owens and Dr. William Martin be attached to the Medical Corps of the Navy as additional assistant surgeons not in the line of promotion," and express the opinion that favorable action by Congress to that end would be a proper recognition of their services in the Navy.

Very respectfully,

R. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. J. F. C. TALBOTT,
House of Representatives.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TALBOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH HUMPHRIES.

Mr. BREWER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported adversely upon the bill (H. R. No. 1479) for the relief of Joseph Humphries; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SHIP-CARPENTERS.

Mr. BREWER, from the same committee, also reported adversely upon the bill (H. R. No. 2527) to authorize assimilated rank to warrant officers of the United States Navy known as ship-carpenters; which was laid on the table and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. BREWER. I move that the vote of the House in the last case reported by me be reconsidered; and that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ABSALOM KIRBY.

Mr. HARMER, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4607) for the relief of Passed Assistant Engineer Absalom Kirby; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RELIEF FOR THE SUFFERING POOR OF IRELAND.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I have been instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 4298) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to designate a vessel of the United States to carry, free of charge, contributions for the relief of the suffering people of Ireland. It is a public bill, but I ask consent to report it at this time.

There was no objection, and the report was received.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I understand that there is on the Speaker's table a joint resolution from the Senate for a similar purpose. I have consulted with the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs this morning, and they authorize me to ask that the Senate joint resolution be taken up and considered in place of the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee having reported by unanimous consent a public bill from the Committee on Naval Affairs, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to designate a vessel of the United States to carry free of charge contributions for the relief of the suffering poor of Ireland, now asks consent that the Senate joint resolution No. 80, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to transport contributions for the relief of the suffering poor of Ireland, be taken from the Speaker's table and considered in place of the House bill.

There was no objection, and the joint resolution was taken from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ any ship or vessel belonging to the Navy of the United States best adapted for such service, for the purpose of transporting to the famishing poor of Ireland such contributions as may be made for their relief, or to charter and employ, under the authority of the United States, a suitable American ship or vessel for the same purpose. Any sum of money which may be necessary to carry out the object of this resolution is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I have no doubt this joint resolution will find a ready response in the heart of every gentleman on this floor.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHITTHORNE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill (H. R. No. 4298) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to designate a vessel of the United States to carry free of charge contributions for the relief of the suffering poor of Ireland was then laid upon the table.

LOUIS P. DI CESNOLA.

Mr. COX, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 1359) for the relief of Louis P. Di Cesnola, late consul at Cyprus.

The bill was read.

Mr. COX. I ask that this bill be put on its passage now.

Mr. DUNNELL. I make the point of order that the bill makes an appropriation, and must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COX. I move, then, that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN C. LANDREAU.

Mr. HILL. The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of John C. Landreau, a naturalized citizen of the United States, for the aid of the Government of the United States in the furtherance of his claim against the government of Peru, have directed me to submit a report, accompanied by a joint resolution, which I hope may be put on its passage now. It does not involve the expenditure of a single dollar, but simply grants in behalf of a citizen of the United States the good offices of the President and Secretary of State in the settlement of a claim against a foreign government. I hope there will be no objection to the passage of this joint resolution.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 219) in relation to the claim of John C. Landreau against the government of Peru was read a first and second time. It provides that the petition of John C. Landreau, the report made thereon by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the accompanying papers be transmitted to the executive department, with the request that the President take such steps as in his opinion may be proper and in accordance with international law to secure to John C. Landreau a final settlement and adjustment of his claim against the government of Peru; and that if in his opinion it is proper to do so, the President invite the government of France to co-operate with the United States in his behalf.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GENERAL FRANCIS A. WALKER.

Mr. COX. The Committee on Foreign Affairs have directed me to report back favorably, for present consideration, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 208) authorizing General Francis A. Walker, Superintendent of the Census, to accept decorations from the governments of Sweden and Spain. I will say that General Walker, while engaged in this service for which the governments of Spain and Sweden have tendered him this recognition, was holding the office of Superintendent of the Census and, though receiving no salary, cannot technically, under our Constitution, accept this honor without the consent of Congress.

Mr. GARFIELD. I presume there will be no objection to this resolution.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That General Francis A. Walker, Superintendent of the Census of the United States, be, and is hereby, authorized to accept a decoration of knight commander of the Swedish order of Wasa, tendered him by the government of Sweden, and also that of commander of the Spanish order of Isabella, from the government of Spain, as a recognition of his services as chief of the bureau of awards at the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, there being ayes 93, noes not counted.

The joint resolution having been read the third time, the question recurred on its passage.

The question being taken, there were ayes 95, noes not counted.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIEUTENANT B. H. BUCKINGHAM.

Mr. COX, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 110) authorizing Lieutenant B. H. Buckingham, United States Navy, to accept a decoration conferred by the president of the French Republic for service in connection with the universal exposition of 1878, at Paris.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that Lieutenant Benjamin H. Buckingham, of the United States Navy, be authorized to accept the decoration of the cross of the national order of the Legion of Honor, conferred upon him by the President of the French Republic, in appreciation of services rendered by him at the universal exposition of 1878, at Paris.

Mr. COX. As some gentlemen on this side of the House have seen proper to oppose this class of innocent legislation, I desire to say one word upon the subject. The Constitution of the United States provides that—

No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States: And no person holding any office of profit or trust under them, shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title, of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign State.

At the time this provision was adopted there was in this country a jealousy in regard to foreign distinctions, titles of nobility, &c. But the reason for this clause has long since passed away. Judge Story, in referring to this subject in his Commentaries, says:

The other clause, as to the acceptance of any emoluments, title, or office from foreign governments, is founded in a just jealousy of foreign influence of every sort. Whether in a practical sense it can produce much effect has been thought doubtful. A patriot will not be likely to be seduced from his duties to his country by the acceptance of any title or present from a foreign power. An intriguing or corrupt agent will not be restrained from guilty machinations in the service of a foreign state by such constitutional restrictions.

The Constitution in that respect is almost a dead letter. There is no reason why these young men, or these old men, if you please, who are servants of the Republic and have distinguished themselves by courtesy or by utility abroad and at home toward foreign powers, should not have these ordinary decorations for the honor of our country.

I send to be read a letter from the minister of foreign affairs at Paris to Lieutenant Buckingham tendering him this decoration. I hope there will be no more of that perfunctory voting on this side of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. I hope the gentleman will not repeat that any part of the Constitution is a dead letter.

Mr. COX. I did not hear what the gentleman from Michigan said.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the gentleman will not repeat in this presence that any part of the Constitution of the United States is a dead letter.

Mr. COX. A dead letter sometimes in some parts of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. Speak for yourself.

The Clerk read as follows:

PARIS, the 21st October, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to announce to you that the Marshal President of the republic, wishing to recognize by a particular mark of his esteem and well wishes the part that you have taken in the labors that have assured the success of the universal exhibition of 1878, has just, upon my recommendation, and upon the nomination of my colleague, the minister of agriculture and commerce, conferred upon you the cross of chevalier of the national order of the Legion of Honor. I make haste to transmit to you the insignia, which are destined for you, and I will have care to have sent to you shortly the diploma of the order.

Accept, sir, the assurances of my highest consideration.

WADDINGTON,
Minister of Foreign Affairs.

B. H. BUCKINGHAM,
Lieutenant of the Navy,
Attaché to the Commission.

Mr. COX. Inquiry has been made whether it is usual to pass these bills. They have never been rejected by Congress—never, but always have been passed. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question recurred on the passage of the joint resolution.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 90, noes 10.

So (no further vote being demanded) the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AUTHORIZING LIEUTENANT METCALFE TO ACCEPT DECORATION.

Mr. COX. I have one more bill of the same character, which ends the chapter. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report back joint resolution (H. R. No. 112) authorizing First Lieutenant Henry Metcalfe, of the Ordnance Department, United States Army, to accept a decoration from the Sultan of Turkey, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The joint resolution, which was read, authorizes First Lieutenant Henry Metcalfe, of the Ordnance Department of the United States Army, to accept a decoration of the Order of the Osmanie, which has been tendered him by the Sultan of Turkey as an evidence of his appreciation of the efforts of that officer in conducting the inspection of arms and ammunition manufactured for the imperial Ottoman government in the cities of Providence, Rhode Island, and Bridgeport and New Haven, Connecticut.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARY W. JONES.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 2572) granting a pension to Mary W. Jones; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SARAH M. BIRDSALL.

Mr. DIBRELL, from the same committee, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 3732) granting a pension to Sarah M. Birdsall; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO LAWS OF 1875.

On motion of Mr. WHITEAKER, the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 3696) to amend chapter 275 of the laws of 1875, and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims, not to come back on a motion to reconsider.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF FRANCIS WARE.

On motion of Mr. WHITEAKER, the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the legal representatives of Francis Ware, praying for the payment of a final certificate, and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

WAR OF 1812.

Mr. WHITEAKER also, from the same committee, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 1867) to amend section 3 of the act of March 9, 1878, relating to pensions for services in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SOLDIERS WHO SERVED FOURTEEN DAYS IN WAR OF 1812.

Mr. WHITEAKER. I am also instructed by the same committee to report back joint resolution (H. R. No. 40) to construe the act of March 9, 1878, to include soldiers who served fourteen days in the war of 1812, although a portion of the time occurred after the proclamation of the treaty of peace with Great Britain, with amendments, and to ask for its passage at this time.

The joint resolution and amendments were read.

Mr. WHITE. Is this a private bill?

Mr. WHITEAKER. No, it is a general bill.

Mr. WHITE. I am opposed to its being considered to-day if it is not a private bill.

Mr. DIBRELL. I hope the gentleman will not oppose it.

Mr. WHITE. I should like to know how many people it affects.

Mr. WHITEAKER. Very well, then; let it go to the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania object to the reporting of the joint resolution?

Mr. WHITE. I do not; let it go to the public Calendar.

The joint resolution and amendments were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BETSEY ELWELL.

Mr. FARR, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4608) granting a pension to Betsey Elwell, formerly Betsey Butler, widow of Jeremiah Elwell, a private in the Twenty-first Regiment United States Infantry, war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLACKBURN and Mr. BRIGHT. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has; and this being Friday, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT.]

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I wish to move, as an amendment to that motion, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, the Chair will first submit the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to give notice that should that motion be voted down I will move to go into Committee of the Whole on the revision of the rules.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. BRIGHT; and upon a division there were—ayes 33, noes 78.

Mr. BRIGHT. No quorum has voted, and I will call for tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BRIGHT and Mr. BLACKBURN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 57, noes 92.

Before the result of this vote was announced, Mr. WHITE said: I think we had better have the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. BURROWS. There is no need of that.

Mr. WHITE. Very well; I will withdraw the call.

So the motion of Mr. BRIGHT was not agreed to.

ADMISSIONS TO THE FLOOR.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks, on behalf of Mr. BUTTERWORTH, of Ohio, that Messrs. O'Hagan, Marriott, and Wilkins, of the Ohio senate, be admitted to the floor of the House during to-day and to-morrow.

Mr. FINLEY. And I ask the same privilege for Hon. W. W. Armstrong, ex-secretary of state of Ohio.

There being no objection, the above requests were granted.

W. J. TAPP & CO.

Mr. PHELPS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4623) for the relief of W. J. Tapp & Co.; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

SALE OF CERTAIN PROPERTY IN NEW YORK.

Mr. GIBSON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to request of the House that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2268) to authorize the sale of certain property in the city of New York, and that the same be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means.

There was no objection, and the Committee of the Whole was accordingly discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the same was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

TRANSPORTATION OF IMPORTED MERCHANDISE.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4623) to amend the statutes in relation to the immediate transportation of imported merchandise; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

BATTLE-FIELD OF GETTYSBURGH.

Mr. BINGHAM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4624) to provide for marking the positions of the regiments and batteries on the battle-field of Gettysburgh; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REGULATION OF STEAM-VESSELS.

Mr. THOMAS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4625) to amend section 4414 of chapter 1, Title LII, "Regulations of steam-vessels," Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

STEAM-TUG WANDERER.

Mr. THOMAS also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4626) to change the name of the steam-tug Wanderer, of Clinton, Iowa, to that of A. B. Safford, of Mound City, Illinois; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MISSOURI ANDERSON.

Mr. THOMAS also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4627) granting a pension to Missouri Anderson, of Massac Creek, Illinois; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

F. D. DISMUKE AND T. W. THURMAN.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4628) for the relief of Frederick D. Dismuke and Thomas W. Thurman, of Georgia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

THOMAS J. WHARTON.

Mr. SAMFORD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 1349) for the relief of Thomas J. Wharton, of Jackson, Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

J. M. MICOW AND OTHERS.

Mr. SAMFORD also, from the same committee, by unanimous consent, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 2969) for the relief of J. M. Micow and others; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

THOMAS FAIN.

Mr. SAMFORD also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4629) for the relief of Thomas Fain; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to make a report from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that two members of the Committee on Military Affairs, who were absent this morning when their committee was called, desire unanimous consent to make reports from that committee.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I must insist upon my motion to go into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. WHITE. Does it not take a two-thirds vote on private bill day?

The SPEAKER. The motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar has been voted down by the House.

The motion of Mr. BLACKBURN was agreed to.

REVISION OF THE RULES.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CARLISLE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of further considering the report of the Committee on Rules. At the time the committee rose yesterday the Clerk had begun the reading of Rule XXII, but had not concluded it. The Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XXII.

OF PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

1. Members having petitions or memorials to present may deliver them to the Clerk, indorsing their names and the reference or disposition to be made thereof; and said petitions and memorials, except such as, in the judgment of the Speaker, are of an obscene or insulting character, shall be entered on the Journal together with the names of the members presenting them, and the Clerk shall furnish a transcript thereof to the official reporters of debates for publication in the RECORD.

Mr. DUNNELL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] if this rule does away with the present custom of presenting memorials by placing them in the box at the Clerk's desk?

Mr. BLACKBURN. It does not.

Mr. DUNNELL. The phraseology is different from that of the old rule.

Mr. BLACKBURN. In the opinion of the Committee on Rules it does not change the present practice at all.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. Any petition or memorial excluded under this rule shall be returned to the member from whom it was received; and petitions which have been inappropriately referred may, by direction of the committee having possession of the same, be properly referred in the manner originally presented.

Mr. DUNNELL. I have not prepared any amendment to offer to this clause, but during the general debate on this revision I called the attention of the committee to the clause; and the gentleman from Kentucky may remember the criticisms that were then made upon it. It is a departure from the present custom. Now, when a committee has had placed in its possession a bill which in its judgment ought to go to some other committee, the custom is for the committee to report it back to the House, and let the House refer it to that other committee. This, I think, is a very much better rule than that here proposed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Under the existing rule when a committee has been charged with the consideration of a petition or memorial which in its judgment should be referred to some other committee, there is no way for it to relieve itself of the custody of that paper, except by bringing it back to the House and letting the House make a change of reference. This proposed rule gives to each committee of the House the power of changing the reference of a petition or memorial referred to it, when in the judgment of such committee it has been inappropriately referred.

The only advantage that we claim will result from the adoption of this rule is in the time that will be saved. The gentleman from Minnesota himself, in his long experience in this House, has often known it to be the fact that members of committees were struggling here for days and days to get an opportunity to have a paper re-referred when it had been inappropriately sent to the committee. Thus action by the House is delayed and the time of the House taken up; and I know but very few, if any, instances in which such request has ever been refused. The Committee on Rules in proposing this clause of the twenty-second rule have taken it for granted that each standing or regular committee of the House is able to determine whether a petition or memorial sent to it belongs to it properly or not; and when such a paper has been improperly referred it was the opinion of the Committee on Rules that the committee having the custody of the paper should have the right to make a proper reference of it without coming here and occupying the time and attention of the House.

Mr. HAWLEY. Would not the gentleman have this change of reference appear on the Journal and in the RECORD?

Mr. BLACKBURN. It may be proper that the Journal should show the change of reference.

Mr. DUNNELL. But how will the officers of the House get knowledge of that fact?

Mr. BLACKBURN. The rule does not provide, nor is it possible it shall provide, a method that would bring to the knowledge of the journal clerk officially the change of reference, unless we adhere to the old rule and require that the document shall be brought back to the House.

Mr. HAWLEY. Could there not be added to this rule a clause providing that the committee in such case cause entry to be made on the Journal?

Mr. BLACKBURN. There is no objection to that; but it would simply impose upon the committee proposing the change of reference the duty of notifying the journal clerk.

Mr. HAWLEY. There ought to be some provision of that kind; otherwise we would be put entirely off the track in hunting for a bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have no objection to such an amendment.

Mr. HAYES. Let it be provided that the change of reference shall be entered on the Journal.

Mr. REAGAN. It will be seen that the last part of this clause provides that the paper is to be "properly referred in the manner originally presented." In other words, the committee to whom it may have been improperly referred will refer it to another committee through the petition-box, and thus the new reference will be noted on the Journal.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Gentlemen will find on examining the pending clause that it has no reference to bills, but refers only to petitions and memorials to be placed in the box.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Is there any proposition pending? The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands not.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to amend the clause by striking out all after the word "referred," in the third line, and adding the following:

Shall be reported back to the House for such further reference as the House shall determine.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is the rule we have now.

Mr. DUNNELL. This, I confess, is substantially a continuance of the present rule.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the clause now under consideration does not treat of bills at all. It speaks only of petitions and memorials which go through the petition-box.

Mr. REAGAN. And when such petitions or memorials have been improperly referred, it authorizes them to come back through the petition-box for proper reference.

Mr. BLACKBURN. This clause simply provides that petitions or memorials improperly referred shall come back for re-reference by the same channel through which they originally came into the House.

Mr. DUNNELL. In view of the explanation which has been made, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HAYES. I move to amend the clause by adding the words "and a record of the same shall be made upon the Journal."

Mr. BLACKBURN. This amendment is not necessary. If these papers come back in the same manner in which they were originally presented, as this clause provides they must—that is, through the petition-box—the journal clerk is bound to take note of them.

Mr. HAYES. If that be so, it is all I want. But when I have presented a memorial I want to know where it goes; I want to be able to trace it up.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the gentleman will look at it I am satisfied he will be content with the rule.

Mr. WEAVER. I move as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois the following.

The CHAIRMAN. Did not the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his amendment?

Mr. HAYES. If it be true, as stated by the gentleman from Kentucky having charge of the rules, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WEAVER. Then I offer it as a separate proposition.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the second clause add as follows:

Unless the member presenting said petition or memorial shall object, in which case said petition or memorial shall not be referred to another committee except by order of the House.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FINLEY. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky and of the gentlemen of the House to the fact that this clause should be amended in some way so as to provide for the printing of private bills. We all have had experience of the inconvenience of the present rule in that regard. If the gentleman will consent to the amendment to clause 5 of section 21—

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I object.

Mr. FINLEY. Then I move the following as an amendment to clause 3 of section 22.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I reserve the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. FINLEY. I move to add the following:

All bills of a private nature shall be referred to appropriate committees, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I make the point of order that is not germane, and therefore not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks he cannot dictate to the committee in what part of the report such provision shall be inserted.

Mr. BLACKBURN. This relates to nothing but the petitions or memorials.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Bills are treated of elsewhere, and that part of the report we have already passed.

Mr. FINLEY. I am not at all tenacious about this matter.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Very well, then; let us have a vote on the amendment.

Mr. FINLEY's amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XXIII.

OF COMMITTEES OF THE WHOLE HOUSE.

1. In all cases in forming a Committee of the Whole House the Speaker shall leave his chair after appointing a chairman to preside.
2. Whenever a Committee of the Whole House finds itself without a quorum the chairman shall cause the roll to be called, and thereupon the committee shall rise, and the chairman shall report the names of the absentees to the House, which shall be entered on the Journal.

3. All motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people; all proceedings touching appropriations of money, or bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriation to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, or releasing any liability to the United States for money or property, shall be first considered in a Committee of the Whole, and a point of order under this rule shall be good at any time before the consideration of a bill has commenced.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I move to amend the third clause of Rule XXIII by adding the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

And this clause of Rule XXIII shall not be suspended when the amount involved exceeds $10,000, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. The effect of that rule is to require every bill involving an expense of $10,000 or more to be considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union before it can pass. I think the amendment is in the interest of economy and of judicious and discreet legislation, and I do hope it will pass.

Mr. COX. I move to strike out "$10,000;" for if it is good for $10,000 it will be good for any amount.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman strike out the words "when the amount involved exceeds $10,000?"

Mr. COX. Yes, sir; those are the words I move to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. So it will then read: "And this clause shall not be suspended except by unanimous consent."

Mr. MILLS. Would that defeat the river and harbor bill on a two-third suspension?

Mr. DUNNELL. It seems to me the adoption of this rule would very frequently stop legislation—render it impossible for the House to transact the business which might be before it. We might be on the very last day of a session passing an appropriation bill and might wish to suspend the rules to pass the bill, which, in the history of the House, very frequently is necessary, and yet we are here putting ourselves in the power of one objector, who can prevent the passage of any appropriation bill. The two-third rule is guard and protection enough to a House of Representatives responsible to the people under the Constitution. It seems to me we are tying ourselves down by a rule which we shall be compelled to disregard. Are we not to be trusted in the transaction of public business? A two-third vote ought to be sufficient protection. Here we are asked to adopt a rule so one man may defeat the passage of a bill. I think this is a dangerous rule to adopt.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, we have now under an amendment that was adopted yesterday a rule which requires the yeas and nays to be taken on all measures. That rule, I suppose, like all other rules, can be suspended. I think there are many cases where it would be proper to suspend the rules where the amount involved is small, as for instance in pension and other small claims coming from the Committee on Invalid Pensions or other committees. But for one I desire that every bill requiring the appropriation of a greater amount of money than $10,000 shall be considered in the Committee of the Whole where amendments may be proposed, and where they may be considered.

We all know the manner in which the river and harbor bill—and I speak not in any sense in hostility to the committee from which these bills have been heretofore in the habit of coming—but we all know that under a suspension of the rules these bills have been passed without an opportunity for considering or amending them in any form. They have been passed as they come from the committee, and I submit there can be no danger when any appropriation of money is considered in Committee of the Whole. But there is danger even of two-thirds of this House agreeing to pass through under a gag-law bills like the river and harbor bill, which cover many items.

Mr. DUNNELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that he has not held the gentleman in this instance to the strict rule, but he gives notice that hereafter he will do so. The gentleman from North Carolina addressed the committee and took his seat, and by a strict construction of the rules he would not have been permitted to address the committee again. The Chair, however, allowed him to do so and will now grant the gentleman from Minnesota the same privilege.

Mr. DUNNELL. I wish to say, in reply to the gentleman who has just addressed the committee, that I do not suppose the House will adopt the rule that was made yesterday on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky. While the gentleman very well stated his side of the case, I do not believe the House will adopt the rule that the gentleman introduced.

Now, for one, I hope that we will get through with this new code, and that the House will adopt it in some form as an improvement upon the old system. I desire to vote for it, and I will vote for it as it stands rather than see it defeated. But with reference to that portion of the report of the Committee on Rules which has not yet been passed, I sincerely hope that it will not be loaded down with amendments like we adopted on yesterday, to which I have referred, and like this which the gentleman here proposes.

Mr. SAMFORD. I desire to offer the following as an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That a bill may be passed under a suspension of the rules by a two-thirds vote taken by yeas and nays without going to the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina proposed an amendment, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] proposed an amendment to that amendment, and until that is disposed of no other amendment can be in order.

Mr. SAMFORD. I understand that the gentleman from North Carolina accepts the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I do accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Alabama is in order.

Mr. SAMFORD. The object of that amendment is not to prevent the necessary restrictions which should be thrown around the disbursement of money. Many cases will arise such as have been suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota where we will not have time to put these bills into the Committee of the Whole for consideration, but this amendment will require sufficient consideration so that members of the House may be able to consider these bills before they are voted on, as it will require a two-thirds vote by yeas and nays to suspend this rule. At the same time it will not destroy that salutary restriction which should be thrown around every money bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from North Carolina to say that he accepted the amendment of the gentleman from New York. Was that correct?

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. It was.

The CHAIRMAN. And now the gentleman accepts the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama also, which takes the gentleman's original amendment away from the committee, and the question, therefore, now is upon the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX. I would like to hear the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama read again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HAWLEY. Now let us have the whole amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the whole of it.

Mr. COX. I have not accepted the amendment myself.

Mr. SAMFORD. The gentleman from North Carolina accepted the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the question. The gentleman from North Carolina proposed an amendment, and the gentleman from New York also proposed an amendment, which was accepted by the gentleman from North Carolina, as the Chair understands. Then the gentleman from Alabama offered an amendment, which the gentleman from North Carolina also accepted, so that the only proposition now before the committee is the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama, which has been read.

Mr. COX. I propose now to address myself to the amendment suggested by my friend from Alabama. That proviso seems to be based on the idea that a two-thirds vote can suspend the rules at any time, while our rules only fix certain times when it may be done, as, for instance, on Monday and the last six days of the session.

Mr. SAMFORD. I am in favor of all restrictions being thrown around our legislation which it is possible to have. But cases may arise when it is absolutely necessary that there should be legislative action, and if you have the rules so that you cannot suspend them at all you will occasionally be in a bad fix.

Mr. COX. I will not detain the committee, as I know the anxiety of my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] to get on with the rules. I am in favor of having every money bill that comes here discussed in Committee of the Whole. I am opposed to any bill of a money character going through without debate and without amendment. We only truly represent the people when we stand upon that principle.

Mr. CLYMER. My objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama is that while now we can only move to suspend the rules on Monday, his amendment would make such a motion in order on any day. The effect of it would be to give us an eternal Monday.

Mr. REAGAN. The rule as reported by the committee, it seems to me, covers all that is necessary; and I do not see the necessity of the House putting itself in a strait-jacket so that it cannot do anything. We have all the necessary safeguards in the rules reported by the committee; and if gentlemen want the revision of the rules to be adopted they had better not fix them so as to compel the rejection of the whole codification. This should be considered when it is proposed to provide restrictions additional to those reported by the committee.

The question being put on Mr. SAMFORD's amendment, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of Rule XXIII and read as follows:

4. In Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the bills on the Calendar shall be taken up in their order; but when objection is made to the consideration of a bill a majority of the House shall decide without debate whether it shall be disposed of or laid aside for the present.

5. When general debate is closed by order of the House any member shall be allowed five minutes to explain any amendment he may offer, after which the member who shall first obtain the floor shall be allowed to speak five minutes in opposition to it, and there shall be no further debate thereon; but the same privilege of debate shall be allowed in favor of and against any amendment that may be offered to an amendment; and neither an amendment nor an amendment to an amendment shall be withdrawn by the mover thereof unless by the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. PAGE. Clause 5 limits the debate on any amendment that may be offered in Committee of the Whole to an appropriation bill or any other bill to two speeches of five minutes each after general debate has been closed. It seems to me that is bringing the thing down to a very narrow limit.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the rule now.

Mr. PAGE. Then the rule is not enforced now.

Mr. HAYES. You can move formal amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the identical rule which now exists.

The Clerk resumed the reading and read as follows:

6. The House may, by the vote of a majority of the members present, at any time after the five minutes' debate has begun upon proposed amendments to any section or paragraph to a bill, close all debate upon such section or paragraph or, at its election, upon the pending amendments only; but this shall not preclude further amendment, to be decided without debate.

7. A motion to strike out the enacting words of a bill shall have precedence of a motion to amend; and, if carried, shall be considered equivalent to its rejection. Whenever a bill is reported from a Committee of the Whole with a recommendation to strike out the enacting words, and such recommendation is disagreed to by the House, the bill shall stand recommitted to the said committee without further action by the House. But before the question of concurrence is submitted, it is in order to entertain a motion to refer the bill to any committee, with or without instructions, and when the same is again reported to the House it shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole without debate.

8. The rules of proceeding in the House shall be observed in Committees of the Whole House so far as they may be applicable.

RULE XXIV.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

1. Each Monday morning, during a session of Congress, all the States and Territories shall be called in their alphabetical order for bills, joint resolutions, and memorials of State and territorial Legislatures, and House resolutions, for reference; and, on this call only, resolutions of inquiry directed to the heads of the Executive Departments shall be in order, to be submitted and referred to the appropriate committees, which shall report thereon to the House within one week.

Mr. MILLS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6 of the first paragraph of Rule XXIV strike out all after the word "submitted" and insert as follows:

And said resolution shall lie upon the table; and the mover or proposer of such resolution shall be permitted to call up the same after the reading of the Journal during any time after the expiration of one week and have the same submitted to a vote of the House without debate.

Mr. MILLS. I have submitted this amendment to my friend from Maine, [Mr. FRYE], and he approves of it. I will explain it briefly to the Committee of the Whole, and when I have done so I am sure there will be no objection to it.

Under the existing rule a resolution calling for information is required to be referred to a committee, and that committee is authorized and required to report within a week and then the House can act upon it. The Committee on Rules in this revision also authorizes the committee to whom a resolution of inquiry is required to report within a week; but the report when it is made goes on the Calendar. You have then to wait until that point of the Calendar is reached, and it may be three or four months before you can get the information. This amendment simply requires that a resolution calling for information shall lie upon the table, after being submitted and read, for one week, that everybody may have time to think of it, and that after one week the proposer can call it up and submit it without debate to a vote of the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] one question. As I understand, by this first clause of the twenty-fourth rule what is known as the morning hour on Monday is dispensed with, and all the States and Territories shall be called for the introduction of bills, joint resolutions, &c.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, and in their alphabetical order.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) So that on Monday every Member representing a State and every Delegate from a Territory who has bills, &c., to present for reference shall have that opportunity.

Mr. DUNNELL. That is right.

Mr. GILLETTE. I offer as an amendment, to come in after the first paragraph, what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Each member of this House shall be entitled to introduce one bill upon one general subject during each Congress and to report the same upon his own authority for reference to its proper Calendar, and shall be recognized for that purpose by the Speaker during the call of States for bills on Mondays. These bills shall be known as individual bills, and shall be so designated upon their face, and shall be printed and placed upon their proper Calendar the same as if reported by some committee of this House.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. Chairman, each member of this House represents about one hundred and fifty thousand American citizens. When we come here charged by the votes of our constituents with some special duties, the introduction of some measures or policy dear to them, we come as absolute equals, as we were designed to be by the founders of this Government. But we are hardly seated in our places before three-quarters of us are sent to the rear, or, perhaps, I should say, pigeon-holed in committees, whose duties, if they have any, are utterly foreign to our mission here, and we find ourselves ciphers, or the next thing to it, in this congressional machine, and find it impossible to get a solitary measure before this House for consideration unless by the grace of a handful of our brother members who were sent to the front by the same ipse dixit that sent us to the rear. Without a solitary vote of this House, before we knew it, in the twinkling of an eye, a Chinese wall of distinction was built up between the ins and the outs—between a half dozen committees and the rest of the members. In short, the purest despotism in the world was organized over our heads, and it was done by these rules, which we are asked to perpetuate, which we have tried to republicanize a little by dividing up the responsibilities between more committees, but have almost entirely failed. Now, I ask for one crumb of justice to each district in the United States; I ask that each member shall know when he comes that during his two years of congressional duties he may be able to bring to the consideration of this House one measure in deference to the desires of his constituents, in deference to his pledges to the people.

I claim that under my amendment these individual bills would be as well or better considered than if in the hands of a committee, because the reputation of each member presenting them would be at stake, and these bills would embody the wishes of each congressional district. My measure would simply open one door for the direct representation of every section of the country upon this floor. It is not a partisan measure, but a national one in the interest of democratic government. Every man in my presence knows that I speak only the truth when I say that under these rules even a majority is helpless in this House. For example, last session we voted by a handsome majority in favor of an income-tax bill, but it failed to pass because not reported by a committee, and although a majority of us desire to pass such a bill, we have not a committee in this House that will report it and let us vote upon it. More than one hundred members were sent here pledged to vote for the retirement of all national-bank notes and the issue in lieu thereof of United States money; pledged to restore to the nation the greatest prerogative of sovereignty, the control of the circulating medium. The only committee that could report a bill for this object are as dumb as an oyster, and will remain so, notwithstanding they have had a perfect shower-bath of bills referred to them by the House for this purpose. I mention this to show how this House is hampered and tied and gagged by these autocratic rules, and to appeal to every representative of freemen on this floor to demand this one measure of equality for the people of his district that this House may be in some sense a House of Representatives of the people. I know the great committees that control us will object, but I appeal to the men all over this House, the three-quarters that are frozen out and sent to the rear, to stand by my demand that each shall have one chance in two years before this body. The people all over this country are groaning under rings and monopolies. Centralization in railroads gives them railroad kings to extort crushing tribute from them; centralization of capital, with corrupt class legislation, gives them over two thousand national-bank presidents, who organize with such power as to control the machinery of this Government and defy its authority, while they lay heavier burdens upon the people than they can bear.

These and other abuses could not stand an hour outside but for the more dangerous centralization in this House; for it is utterly impossible to get a single measure of substantial relief before this body under these rules. There are rings everywhere, but the head-center of all rings is right here, created by these rules, and every bill introduced for the overthrow of centralization and rings outside has to run the gauntlet of the centralization and rings in this House, and if we are not men enough to take the control and give this House a republican government where one Representative stands upon the same footing as another, and each member has a right to bring at least one measure before this body, then we can never hope to reach the monopolies outside that are crushing the people and menacing their liberties. Physicians heal thyself!

In England during the latter part of the last and early in this century, when the right of franchise was extremely limited, all the elective offices were purchased of the voters in open market by the most unblushing bribery. As soon as the right of suffrage was greatly extended it became impossible to bribe the voters, and purity of elections ensued. So it is in this House. If equal rights can be extended to all the members it will at once become impossible for corporations and capitalists to control legislation.

I have heard of slaves so degraded that they would advocate slavery as preferable to freedom, but it is the greatest wonder of the world that honored Representatives of proud, free American citizens will stand up in this House and vote away their rights and the rights of their constituents, imposing upon themselves fetters and disabilities of every kind by these rules, drafted in the interest of the cunning few—drafted by members who now enjoy the best offices in this House, by leading republicans and democrats who have pooled their issues in order that they may continue to hold the key to legislation that belongs by every principle of justice equally to us all. They leave no stone unturned in their efforts to persuade all the members to vote for these rules. Whenever it is necessary the party tiger is brought out on either side in order to fill the minds of members with party prejudice and in the heat of passion induce them to vote their rights away.

I protest against a system of government for this House which cuts off from this body the pulsations of the American people, which practically counts out the rural districts and gives the control of the nation into the hands of eastern cities and corporations. I warn all who hear my voice that if these rules as reported are to be the law of this body, the greatest danger to our liberties lies right here, in a centralized government, not a representative one—a government practically out of reach of the masses of the people.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman ought to extend the time of each Congress five years in order to carry out such a rule.

The question being taken on Mr. GILLETTE's amendment, there were—ayes 53, noes 74.

Mr. LOWE. A quorum has not voted.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. BLACKBURN, and the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. GILLETTE.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 93.

So (further count not being insisted on) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GILLETTE. I offer now the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in as a separate clause after the first clause of Rule XXIV.

The Clerk read as follows:

Each member of this House shall be entitled to introduce one bill upon one general subject during each Congress, to be known as an individual bill, and to be so marked upon its face, which shall be referred to its proper committee for consideration and report. These bills shall be reported to the House within four weeks of the date of reference, with the committee report thereto attached, and shall go upon the proper Calendar with the report of the committee, whether that report is favorable or adverse, and in case they are not reported by the committee within the specified time, they are to be placed upon the Calendar as if reported for the action of this House.

Mr. GILLETTE. I think I have left out everything which in the amendment just voted upon might have been looked upon as objectionable by any member of this House. These bills, under the arrangement I now propose, would go to the appropriate committees, and there would be one month for the committee to discuss and report them. The amendment simply opens the door so that each district of the United States can get before this House any measure on which its Representative particularly desires action, at least once during the existence of a Congress.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. GILLETTE; and upon a division there were—ayes 25, noes 87.

No further count being called for, the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. On all days other than Monday, as soon as the Journal is read and approved, there shall be a morning hour for reports from committees, which shall be appropriately referred and printed; and the Speaker shall call upon each standing committee in regular order, and then upon the select committees; and if the whole of the hour is not consumed by this call, then it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of other business, but if he shall not complete the call within the hour, he shall resume it in the succeeding morning hour where he left off.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I move to amend the clause just read by inserting, after the words "shall be appropriately referred and printed," the words "and a copy thereof mailed to each Member and Delegate;" so that the clause, if amended, will read as follows:

On all days other than Monday, as soon as the Journal is read and approved, there shall be a morning hour for reports from committees, which shall be appropriately referred and printed, and a copy thereof mailed to each Member and Delegate, &c.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let me say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I have no authority from the Committee on Rules to accept his proposed amendment; but for myself I have no objection to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think it is a good thing.

Mr. BLACKBURN. So do I.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) If the amendment shall be adopted, then no member would ever have the right to say that he was not informed, because if he did not obtain the information under this proposed amendment it would be his own fault.

A MEMBER. It might use up all the copies that were printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. There are 1,500 copies printed, and the effect of this amendment would be merely to provide each member with a copy in his own room. I think it is right.

Mr. ROBINSON. The amendment proposed does not impose this duty on any person in particular. It merely says "shall be mailed," but does not say by whom.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. It merely refers to bills which are reported from committees.

Mr. ROBINSON. I agree that it should be done, but who is to do it?

Mr. BLACKBURN. It can be done by the Clerk.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Let them be mailed as the RECORDS are mailed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I would suggest the insertion of the words "by the Clerk."

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I have no objection to that.

Mr. KEIFER. It may be imposing too much duty on the Clerk.

Mr. GARFIELD. Insert the words "by the Public Printer."

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I will accept that suggestion.

Mr. KEIFER. If those words are not inserted that would be the result.

The question was then taken upon the amendment as modified, and it was adopted.

Mr. DUNNELL. I have heard some discussion in regard to the construction that would be put upon this sentence of this pending clause: "there shall be a morning hour for reports from committees, which shall be appropriately referred and printed." The question that arises in my mind is whether it would be competent for the member of a committee reporting a bill to ask that it be put on its passage; or whether this is intended to be an iron arbitrary rule, sending each report so made to its proper calendar.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Committee on Rules have in this proposed revision sought to do away with the practice of consuming the morning hour in the consideration of bills that may be reported, and to provide for sending each bill when reported to its place upon the proper calendar. This clause of the twenty-fourth rule was framed with that view. It is the purpose, and the purpose will be accomplished if this revision is adopted by the House, to put a stop to the consumption of the morning hour by the consideration and discussion of any report made from a committee in that hour.

Mr. DUNNELL. The question was whether, in case I should make a report from a committee, I would be in order to ask for the consideration and passage of the bill so reported.

Mr. CLYMER. You would be in order to ask it, but it would require unanimous consent.

Mr. BLACKBURN. My construction of the clause is this: unanimous consent could be granted for that purpose by the House, for the House can do anything by unanimous consent; but it could not be done otherwise.

The Clerk read the following:

3. The morning hour for the call of committees shall not be dispensed with except by a vote of two-thirds of those present and voting thereon.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I move to amend the clause just read by adding thereto what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to clause 3, Rule XXIV, the following:

Nor shall it be in order at any time for the Speaker to ask that business be transacted by unanimous consent, except to dispense with the reading of papers, grant leave of absence, and present executive communications or other papers or make such communications as are proper for the Speaker to do; but where unanimous consent would otherwise be required to transact business the question, upon motion, shall be decided by the House without debate, which motion shall be subject to a call for the regular order of business by ten or more members, and shall not prevail unless sustained by a two-thirds vote of the members present and voting.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Will the gentleman explain the effect of his amendment?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. On another occasion I spoke somewhat at length upon this proposed amendment. I desire now only to state its effect as I understand it. It is this: that no business shall be done here by unanimous consent, but where unanimous consent would otherwise be required, it shall be determined by a two-thirds vote, and that motion be subject to a call for the regular order by ten or more members.

Why should any one desiring unanimous consent object to this? If unanimous consent can be obtained, of course a two-thirds vote can be, for the greater includes the less. So that the only possible objection there can be is that it would take a little more time to obtain consent in this way, and that is just what I think very desirable and important. On the other hand if the members demand the regular order, or if, for instance, the members of a committee desire to go on with the regular business before the House, being ten or more, they can call for the regular order; and the motion for the purpose now requiring unanimous consent cannot be submitted to the House at all.

In other words, the object is to take from one man the power to block the wheels of legislation in this House, and invest it in ten or more. How many times within the last two weeks have we seen the business of the House clogged and jeopardized by a single objection? When we wanted to reach the fishery bill the other day, it was said that against objection it would take two hours to do it under the rules as they now stand, though if the proposition had been put to a vote of the House, nine-tenths of all the members would have voted to take that bill up. Yet they were powerless under a single omnipotent objection. I desire to cast no reflection on the gentleman objecting, first because I have no idea who he was, and second because he was exercising his undoubted right under the rules of the House, of which nobody had any right to complain. This amendment will put it in the power of ten men, instead of one, to say when the regular order of business shall be delayed, and put the matter under the control of the vote of two-thirds of the members, instead of a unanimous vote.

Look at the condition of business here. On every Monday morning, even at this stage of the session, one hundred and fifty, one hundred and sixty, or one hundred and seventy-five new bills pour in like a cataract. Then from ten to twenty-five more are brought in by unanimous consent on every morning of the week. This badgering for unanimous consent must be a burden upon the Speaker. He is importuned by members for preference. And yet such proceeding rests wholly upon the temper and caprice of a single member. We crowd down in front of the Clerk's desk with bills or resolutions or propositions of which the House knows nothing, each seeks recognition. The Speaker does the very best he can, discriminating between members, I think, fairly. All at once some member whose breakfast possibly distresses him, demands "the regular order." A few members have succeeded in getting recognized, and the rest go away disgusted, not ruled down by the Speaker or the House, but put down by a single member. Could anything better confirm Hatsel's doctrine that "it is much more material that there should be a rule to go by, than what that rule is; that there may be a uniformity of proceeding in business not subject to the caprice of the Speaker or capriciousness of the members." Yet what more completely breaks up uniformity and promotes confusion than the scenes I have alluded to.

Memorials are presented with the request that they be printed in the RECORD, by unanimous consent. My friend, the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE,] I believe, succeeded the other morning in having a memorial published in that way, and I was glad he did. I admired his pluck and push to get recognized; but immediately afterward some gentleman on the other side asked a similar favor; some member shouted "regular order!" as though he had awakened from a nightmare; and that memorial went the way of all the unfortunates to the petition-box.

Now, why should not this power of objection be taken out of the hands of one man and placed in the hands of ten or more? And what objection can there be, when the request for unanimous consent or its equivalent is asked, that we stop a moment, let the question be stated by the Speaker, let the House get full possession of it and understand just what is going on, then, when objection is asked for, let ten or more object if they desire, and, if not, let the question be put and decided by a two-thirds vote of the members? Who can object to this unless he does not want time, but wants these matters to go through under whip and spur before members can really know whether they wish to object or not? The effect of the amendment would be to put the House fully in possession of matters proposed, give it a moment to reflect, and enable it to act intelligently. At least that is what I desire by the proposed amendment, and if its effect should be to prevent the too frequent granting of unanimous consent I do not think it would be any the worse for that.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, it was not agreed to, there being—ayes 49, noes 68.

The Clerk read as follows:

4. After the hour shall have been devoted to reports from committees, the consideration of the unfinished business in which the House may be engaged at an adjournment shall be resumed, and at the same time each day thereafter, other than Monday, until disposed of; and the consideration of all other unfinished business shall be resumed whenever the class of business to which it belongs shall be in order.

Mr. FRYE. I am instructed by the Committee on Rules to propose certain amendments to this clause, which are rendered necessary by the adoption of an amendment which I offered at the request of the committee a few days since. I move to amend by inserting after the word "committees," in the first line, the words "it shall be in order to proceed to;" by striking out in the third line the words "shall be resumed;" by inserting in the fourth line, after the word "and," the words "it shall be in order to proceed to;" and in the fifth line, by striking out the words "shall be resumed."

Mr. GARFIELD. These are all formal amendments, necessary merely in order to make this clause conform to the previous action of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FRYE. With these amendments the clause will read as follows:

After the hour shall have been devoted to reports from committees it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business in which the House may be engaged at an adjournment; and at the same time each day thereafter, other than Monday, until disposed of; and it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of all other unfinished business whenever the class of business to which it belongs shall be in order.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I wish to direct the attention of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the necessity of another amendment in this clause. One of the amendments which the Committee on Rules recommend for adoption is to provide in the twenty-eighth rule that motions for a suspension of the rules shall be in order only on the first and the third Monday of every month, so that the other Mondays of the month shall be devoted to the business of the House in the same manner as on any other day of the week. I suggest, therefore, whether in this clause the words "other than Monday" should not read "other than the first and the third Monday."

Mr. FRYE. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the Speaker of the House, whether it is not proper to make first the amendments required by the action of the Committee of the Whole already taken; and then no doubt unanimous consent will be given that if the twenty-eighth rule should be amended in the manner indicated, we may return to this clause and amend it so as to conform to that action.

Mr. WEAVER. We do not want to do anything now that will bind the House to adopt the amendment which the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the Speaker of the House, has indicated.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Of course not. All we want is opportunity to make the rules consistent in all their parts.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the request is simply that, if certain amendments be adopted to Rule XXVIII, the Committee of the Whole shall have the privilege of returning to the pending clause for the purpose of making it conform.

Mr. FRYE. That is it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Maine to move to amend so as to provide, "it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration," &c. Does the gentleman mean that, or does he mean to make the language read, "it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House do now proceed to the consideration," which is the language used in the next clause of the same rule with regard to business on the Speaker's table?

Mr. FRYE. I understand the meaning to be the same. The language I have suggested is that used in clause 2 and in two or three other places.

Mr. WARNER. I suggest to the gentleman from Maine whether or not in the third line of this clause the language should not be

"may have been engaged" instead of "may be engaged." It refers to a previous stage of proceeding.

Mr. HAWLEY. "May have been engaged" is better.

Mr. FRYE. I have no objection to including that modification in my amendment.

The amendment of Mr. FRYE, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. FRYE. Was unanimous consent given that, if the twenty-eighth rule should be amended, we might return to this clause and amend it so as to harmonize with Rule XXVIII?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood such consent to be given; but if any gentleman desires to object he can do so now. [A pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

5. Unfinished business having been disposed of, it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House do now proceed to dispose of the business on the Speaker's table, which, prevailing, the Speaker shall dispose of in the following order:

First. Messages from the President and other executive communications.

Second. Messages from the Senate and amendments proposed by the Senate to bills of the House.

Third. Bills and resolutions from the Senate on their first and second reading, that they be referred to committees or put on their passage; and the motions so to refer shall have precedence of all other motions touching their disposition.

Fourth. Engrossed bills and bills from the Senate on their third reading.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is not elegant. "Unfinished business having been disposed of, it shall be in order," &c., then "to dispose of the business upon the Speaker's table." Say "the House shall now proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table."

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not hear the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am suggesting a verbal correction in the second line of this clause, so it shall read, "the House shall now proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table," instead of saying, "to entertain a motion that the House do now proceed to dispose of the business on the Speaker's table." The word "dispose" is used three times where it is unnecessary.

Mr. FRYE. That is all right.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Very well; let the amendment be made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

6. Business on the Speaker's table having been disposed of, it shall then be in order to entertain motions in the following order, namely:

First. That the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider, first, bills raising revenue and general appropriation bills, and then other business on its Calendar.

Second. To proceed to the consideration of business on the House Calendar.

Third. On Friday of each week, after the morning hour, it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar; and, if this motion fail, then public business shall be in order as on other days.

Mr. WHITE. I move to amend the third division of this sixth clause, as follows:

Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private bills and private business, in preference to any other, unless otherwise determined by a majority of the House.

That is identically the old rule known as Rule 128. That is specific and well understood by repeated interpretations in this House. The difference between that and the proposition reported by the committee is, that the proposition reported by the committee makes it in order every Friday after the reading of the Journal for the Speaker to entertain a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Private Calendar. There it stops. The practice hitherto and as now understood under the old rule is to give private business preference all the time.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the gentleman will look on the same page to Rule XXVI, I will ask him whether that does not meet his objection. That rule provides that Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private business, unless otherwise determined by a majority of the House.

Mr. WHITE. I see that if this proposition is adopted it will do away with the necessity for Rule XXVI.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I call the gentleman's attention, if he will allow me, to the fact that this is the third division of the sixth clause of the twenty-fourth rule which he is now proposing to amend. We are not determining the right of that character of business on Friday, but simply describing here the order of business. The committee thought it was of sufficient importance to give one separate, independent rule to the priority of private business on Friday.

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman will observe that the verbiage of this clause of the rule will be the rule of proceedings for the House, and it is somewhat in conflict with the provisions of Rule 128. Why the necessity of changing a rule which is so well understood and which has been so thoroughly administered here?

Mr. BLACKBURN. We mean to do the same thing the gentleman proposes.

Mr. WHITE. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. CALDWELL. After the word "and," in the fourth line of clause 3, insert the following:

If this motion prevail, on each alternate Friday pension bills on the said Calendar shall have precedence in consideration.

I simply desire to say that amendment is offered by direction of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It is a well-known fact to the members of this House that fully one-half, if not more, of the private bills which go on the Calendar are pension bills either for increase of pension or in the nature of an appeal from the Pension Bureau. If it is the purpose of this House to give to those bills a fair opportunity to be passed, then, it occurs to the committee, it is but right to give to them the precedence at least two Fridays in the month. That is the view of the committee on the subject and that is the reason we have offered the amendment.

Mr. WHITE. How will it read then?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the clause as it will read if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Third. On Friday of each week, after the morning hour, it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar; and if this motion prevail, on each alternate Friday pension bills on said Calendar shall have precedence in consideration. If this motion fail, then public business shall be in order as on other days.

Mr. WHITE. I was going to make this remark: I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky. I understand the motive which prompts him to offer this amendment. He states that it comes from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. All right, and then the pension claims of soldiers appeal to our every sense of gratitude and magnanimity. But I will remind that gentleman and the House that pension bills are not the only ones that come here and which go on the Calendar in which we are called upon to relieve soldiers. The experience of every gentleman who has been here for two years is that there are quite as many bills relating to back pay and mustering out or for removing some disability of soldiers as there are for pensions, and I submit that if we give this Pension Committee the privilege here asked for, it should be extended to all these other classes of claims to which I refer.

Mr. CALDWELL. I would suggest to the gentleman that he prepare an amendment to include what he desires. I have no objection to it.

Mr. WHITE. Then I will offer to amend by inserting the words "or for the relief of soldiers."

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, I think that any amendment of this kind must be entirely unavailing for the accomplishment of the object which the gentleman has in view in proposing it. If this House should do no other business from now until the end of the session—indeed, Mr. Chairman, if we should sit here from now until the first Monday of December next, and devote three hours a day every day to the consideration of the pension bills now pending before the two Houses of Congress and give ten minutes to each case we could not get through the list. Even if we gave but five minutes' consideration to each one of these cases, and if we sat here for four months and did no other business, we would be unable to get through with the pension claims alone.

Now, I suggest, therefore, to the gentleman who represents the Committee on Invalid Pensions in offering this amendment, that some other means should be adopted for disposing of these cases than by the method which he proposes. It is due to this House, and it is due to those who are entitled to pensions and who should long ago have had their pension dues, that some better mode of disposing of these claims should be adopted than that offered here.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio what other plan than the one suggested by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky he would propose?

Mr. WARNER. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would like to have the gentleman suggest a plan or present a motion by which these bills can be disposed of in the speedy manner he wishes.

Mr. WARNER. Then I will suggest one, because I think the plan proposed here in this amendment is entirely inadequate. I think there should be a commission constituted to which all of these appeals from the decision of the Commissioner of Pensions should be referred, and only such cases brought before Congress as are not covered by the general law, but at the same time are clearly equitable.

The idea, Mr. Chairman, that this House, composed of two hundred and ninety-three members, paid $5,000 a year each, to sit here as a court of appeals to consider cases brought from the Pension Bureau, making of this House a mere appendage to that bureau, is in my opinion simply ridiculous.

Why, if we should give fair consideration to pension cases, give the time that it would seem ought to be given to them, we could not get through this session with the cases that are now on the Calendar from Pennsylvania alone. We might perhaps then reach Indiana next session and some other State three or four years hence; or we might take in a few from each of the States and leave the rest out, as we inevitably must under this system. Moreover, Mr. Chairman, at best, while we proceed in this way we do but poor justice. Rather I think we do much injustice. A claim is presented, for instance, for an increase of pension for a certain disability and it is granted, but there may be and probably are, one, two, or five hundred like cases. But only the one who has pressed his claim to a consideration here or who has been fortunate enough to get it on the Calendar gets the increase while his comrades, equally worthy, are left without it. Such cases should be classified and if deemed right to give an increase of pension, all of a class should have the same benefits, all should be treated alike.

I think, therefore, this amendment ought not to be adopted, but that a commission of some kind should be established to which an appeal can be taken, and by which all such cases as are now brought here may be considered and be judicially determined, and at the same time those who are not entitled to pensions and all fraudulent claims be kept out. That would not only be in the interest of economy, but in the interest of all meritorious soldiers who are claimants for pensions.

Mr. COFFROTH. I would like to ask the gentleman how many cases there are from Pennsylvania now on the Calendar?

Mr. WARNER. If you were to devote but a very short time to the consideration of each one and call the roll on its passage, as proposed in the new rules, there is no knowing when you could get through with them. Suppose a half hour's consideration to be given to each case, including roll-call, where would we be?

Mr. COFFROTH. The gentleman thinks that all the cases reported by the chairman of that committee came from the State of Pennsylvania; but he is mistaken.

Mr. WARNER. I said no such thing; the gentleman has entirely misunderstood me. I do say this House cannot get through, with the consideration they ought to have, the cases that are on the Calendar from a single State, and that is reason enough why the system should be changed.

Mr. COFFROTH. From his own State one of his colleagues put in one hundred and eight petitions at one time; and gentlemen from Ohio ought not to complain about any other State.

Mr. WARNER. I am making no complaint about that State, but say that we cannot reach them all in five years the way we are doing.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CALDWELL.] This amendment was proposed under instructions from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and, I trust, will receive the sanction of the House. It is well known, sir, that a large number of meritorious bills granting pensions are now upon the Private Calendar. These bills are continued from week to week for the sole reason that under the present rules, and with the various interests of a great country pressing upon us, we have no time to consider them. The House has shown no disposition to reject any of these bills when reported by the committee, but they remain upon the Calendar undetermined for the sole reason, as I have said, that there is no time to pass them.

Now, sir, let us pass this important amendment to the rules. Let a time be set apart exclusively for the consideration of bills of this character. However important other legislation may be, there is none which imposes upon us an obligation more sacred than this. No obligation can rest upon this Government so nearly affecting its honor as that which it owes to its soldiers. The first duty of the Government is to its defenders.

As is well known, Mr. Chairman, many applications of a meritorious character have been rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions because of a failure of the applicant to comply with the strict regulations of the Department in the matter of proof. In many instances such compliance was impossible, and the applicant for a pension, maimed and crippled though he be, is turned away empty. The vexatious delays in our Pension Department have become a reproach to our country. Turned away from the Pension Department upon a technicality, the only hope of the applicant is in an appeal, not to the mercy, but to the justice of Congress. This can only be meted out by special acts.

But, sir, what avails the diligent labors of the Committee on Invalid Pensions if the bills they have considered and reported upon favorably are to find a grave upon the Private Calendar of this House.

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him? I yielded to him.

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman inform us how these claims are considered by the Committee on Pensions? What I said respecting the consideration that could be given all these claims by the House applies also to the consideration that can be given to them by the committee. The committee itself cannot give ten minutes to a case and get half through the list this session.

Mr. STEVENSON. In reply to my friend from Ohio, I will say that I assume and the House assumes when a bill is reported with a favorable recommendation by a committee, that such bill has received the attentive consideration of that committee. The business of this House could be done upon no other hypothesis.

The question before us is a practical one. I concede the difficulty, even under the most liberal rules of considering all of the pension bills which may come before us. But the duty imposed upon us is imperative—is one from which we cannot escape.

The gentleman from Ohio insists that it is impossible for this House to pass judgment upon all of the pension bills upon its Calendar. If so, then, sir, let a commission be established by Congress as a final arbiter between the soldier and his Government, to which all applications of this character can be carried—a tribunal unfettered by the merciless technicalities of the Pension Department, but one whose aim, and only aim, shall be justice.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REAGAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] has moved to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CALDWELL.]

Mr. CALDWELL. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to strike out the last word. It seems to me it is a strange procedure to assume that the Congress of the United States shall undertake to give special preferences to any particular class of meritorious claims pending before it. Are we to assume that the particular class of claims referred to have higher merits than those of the various other claims that come before Congress? The whole arguments that have been made tend to show that if Congress is to act upon these claims promptly and satisfactorily it can do nothing else, and they tend to the conclusion which many have reached long ago, that for the settlement of this question there ought to be a special tribunal organized that should consider claims whether for increase of pension or in the form of appeals from the Commissioner of Pensions. If speedy justice is to be done to the claimants and if justice is to be done also to the Government, that is the mode, it seems to me, gentlemen should pursue who desire to obtain it, instead of converting Congress into a commission for the determination of one class of claims upon its equity and comity in preference to others. It seems to me such a rule as is now proposed would be anomalous, unjust in its character, and improper, and I trust it will not be adopted.

Mr. FINLEY. I desire to occupy the attention of the committee for just one moment. I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CALDWELL.] I believe that precedence should be given to this class of bills. We have but one day in the week on which appeals of this class can be considered; and on Friday a fortnight ago, when the House was in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, we observed that a few gentlemen making objections delayed or entirely prevented the passage or consideration of every bill that was read.

Mr. WARNER. They could not be considered on that day.

Mr. FINLEY. They could have been considered but for the objections of a few gentlemen made to their consideration.

Mr. WARNER. It was objection day.

Mr. FINLEY. I know it was objection day, and those bills would have been passed but for the objection of those gentlemen, for which they assigned no reason except that the bills were in the nature of appeals from the decisions of the Commissioner of Pensions.

I see no good reason why if a soldier believes he has not had full justice done him by the Commissioner of Pensions, after having his petition or case considered by the proper committee of this House, and a favorable report made upon it—I see no good reason why this House shall not consider it, and why this class of cases should not be given precedence over other classes.

Mr. REAGAN. I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I renew it. I have every sympathy with the object in view as proposed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions; but I am not clear in my own judgment whether it is not better to leave pension cases to the magnanimity of the House. And I want to say here, to the honor and credit of every Congress in which I have served, there never has been any objection to giving special meetings for the consideration of pension bills.

Mr. CALDWELL. Was there not an objection to that the other day?

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) There was a single objection the other day; but immediately the Committee on Invalid Pensions came into this House and asked and got the opportunity to offer a motion to suspend the rules so as to give them a special sitting; and I do not believe there would have been ten votes in this House against the proposition to give to the Committee on Invalid Pensions an opportunity of presenting their bills and having them passed at a special session of the House.

Mr. COFFROTH. Was not a motion made to defeat that?

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) No, sir; I do not think that was the motive which caused the objection. On the contrary, I think a very different motive was at the bottom of the motion to adjourn, although I am not permitted to judge of men's motives.

Mr. COFFROTH. Did the motion to adjourn not defeat it?

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) It did not, because on Monday next it will be again reached. I repeat I would rather trust to the magnanimity of the House to pass pension bills. I have seen as many as twenty pension bills passed in the House—coming with favorable recommendation from the Committee of the Whole—passed in two minutes, and have known as many as one hundred and fifty pension bills to pass in a single evening session. It is better to trust to the generosity of the House than tie down its action by technical rules in doing justice to maimed soldiers of the Union Army.

Mr. ROBINSON. I would like to make a suggestion.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. I would suggest to the gentleman that if we shall proceed under the rule as amended yesterday, and call the yeas and nays on everything requiring an expenditure of money, we will not be able to pass many private bills.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) When the House shall come to consider that proposition, if it shall incorporate it into the rules, the gentleman's criticism would be a just one. But it has not been adopted by the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. It has been adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) And even then we could except pension cases. But I really think it would be a great deal better for us to hold special sessions for the consideration of pension bills than to rely upon any particular day in the month, or perhaps two days in a month, for the consideration of such bills. I think, therefore, that in the interest of speedy action on pension bills, in the interest of maimed soldiers, it would be better not to change the rule.

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Certainly.

Mr. WARNER. If pension bills are to be passed in the manner in which the gentleman has stated they have been, a hundred in a few minutes—

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) No, sir; I said twenty in two minutes, and one hundred and fifty in one evening session.

Mr. WARNER. Even at that rate, would it not be better simply to say that we will add at once one thousand, or two thousand, or ten thousand names to the pension-roll, and let the committee, or some member of it, fill up the list?

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I would do so, if the recipients are entitled to pensions and the Committee on Pensions so stated in their report. I would pass them as quickly as I could.

Mr. WARNER. So would I; but I would not have two hundred and ninety-three members of this House turned into a court of appeals for that purpose. That is not the way these cases should be passed upon.

Mr. WEAVER. Why not pass my soldiers' bill, and so settle the whole matter?

Mr. McMAHON. I desire to add my testimony to that of the Speaker of this House in regard to the favorable disposition of every House of which I have been a member toward our soldiers. I think I am correct in the statement that when the last House adjourned there were not fifty pension cases upon the Calendar undisposed of. The House had, by unanimous consent, set apart so many evening sessions for the consideration of pension bills that they were all disposed of, as I may say, with lightning speed, as my friend has intimated.

I want to say to my colleague [Mr. WARNER] that if he will consider the manner in which pension cases are passed upon by the Department, I cannot see why he should give to the decision of that Department any peculiar presumption which may not be overcome by the report of our committee. We all know that it is not the Commissioner of Pensions who passes upon these claims. He refers them to this clerk and to that clerk, to this division and to that division, and they are investigated by persons who, many of them, are not qualified at all to weigh testimony; by men who have become accustomed, as it were, to cut down the expenses of the Government, and who are always upon the side of the Government. If there is to be any presumption at all given to the conclusion of any tribunal I would rather take the conclusion of our Pension Committee as a final result.

I would also say to my colleague that when it comes to the question of money, to the question of giving the soldier his pension, back pay, or bounty, I for one have always been willing to accept the report of the committee, if upon the face of the report the case appears to be a meritorious one. I have always been willing to accept that report as a final adjustment of the case, and always will be, until some other course is adopted; for instance, until there is established in this District a tribunal of three or five judges to consider these claims. And after all, who will they be? They will be but men. And in this House we have a committee of eleven or fifteen members to consider such cases.

Of course, we understand that these pension claims are referred to individual members; but they report to the whole committee which passes upon their reports. It may be that there is a little looseness in regard to this matter; but I would rather see looseness on the side of the soldier than against him. It has been the policy of this Government, ever since its foundation, to pension every man engaged in any of our great wars, after the lapse of a certain period of years from the close of that war.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It has not been done in regard to the soldiers of the Mexican war.

Mr. McMAHON. Such a bill as that has passed this House, and if it were not for the political questions which our friends on the other side are so much in the habit of bringing into the consideration of this subject, that bill would have become a law long ago.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. CALDWELL. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of saying that there is no doubt on the part of myself or any member in regard to the generosity of this House in reference to these pension bills. But there has been a disposition growing up, since the passage of the arrears of pensions bill, not only here, but on the part of distinguished leaders of both political parties elsewhere, to defeat as far as possible every bill introduced into this House that proposes to grant arrearages of pensions. The Speaker of this House, I understand, objects to the amendment I have offered.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Not to the object of it.

Mr. CALDWELL. I understand that; but he objects to my amendment for the reason, as he says, that we can have special night sessions set apart for the consideration of pension bills. The adoption of this amendment will not prevent that, but it will give us at least a fair opportunity to dispose of these bills.

There has been some criticism of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions [Mr. COFFROTH] in reference to the number of bills which he himself has reported. I will say in justice to him, and he deserves it, that he spent his time here in this city when the other members of the committee were at home with their families, investigating the pension cases which had been referred to him by the committee. I do not know whether those cases were from his district or not; it was his duty to consider them. So far as I am concerned I am willing to report to this House every meritorious case referred to me, whether it come from Kentucky, Maine, or Kansas. I believe, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] has said, that it is right and proper to pass these bills, and if we err let us do so on the side of mercy.

Mr. BAKER. If in order I desire to move an amendment of substance, not one merely formal. I move to strike out the words "every other Friday," and to insert the words "every Friday." I had occasion the other day to say something on this question. I desire to say now that, in my judgment, the opposition to the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CALDWELL] arises from a disposition to give preference to other private claims over the claims of soldiers to pensions.

It is a well-known fact—and I appeal to every member of this committee to bear testimony to that fact—that the great consumption of time in the consideration of private business which has been complained of arises upon claims of a questionable character, which provoke long and oftentimes acrimonious discussion, oftentimes debate of a bitter political character. The result of having the business on the Private Calendar so arranged that these questionable claims may be brought up for discussion in preference to other claims will undoubtedly result in delaying pension bills, so that even if they shall finally pass the House they will go to the Senate so late in the session that they will sleep there the sleep of death. I believe it is the duty of this House to so arrange its rules that speedily and without delay every pension bill that is reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions may be disposed of.

If such pension bills are given precedence, my experience in this House for the last five years justifies me in the declaration that no considerable time will be consumed in their discussion and determination. Each Friday we can, within half an hour, dispose of all the pension bills which may have been reported in the course of the week, and then we will be ready to go on, if we desire, with these old, stale, and ancient claims on the Private Calendar, which have brought so much shame and reproach upon preceding Congresses.

I submit that if we shall so amend the rules that on each Friday, upon the first call of the Calendar, all the pension bills reported during the week previous can be considered and disposed of, it would not take more than half an hour to dispose of them all, and the rest of the time can be devoted to other matters.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Believing that we have had about enough discussion on this clause, I will now move that the committee rise with the view of obtaining from the House an order limiting debate upon this clause.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us have a vote upon it now.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If we can get unanimous consent to vote upon the amendment without further debate, I will not press my motion. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain the motion that the committee rise; but before putting the question upon it will call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] to the form of the amendment which he has offered. The gentleman moves to strike out the words "every other Friday" and to insert the words "every Friday." There are no such words in the amendment pending. The words in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CALDWELL] are "on each alternate Friday."

Mr. BAKER. Then I move to strike out the words "each alternate" and to insert the word "every."

The CHAIRMAN. If the word "alternate" be stricken out, the amendment will then read "each Friday."

Mr. BAKER. I will make that motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. Why not strike out "Fri—," so that it will read "each day?"

Mr. HAYES. Is a substitute for the amendment now in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Nothing is now in order, except the vote upon the motion made by the gentleman from Kentucky that the committee now rise.

The motion of Mr. BLACKBURN was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the proposed revision of the rules reported from the Committee on Rules, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules, and pending that motion I move that all debate upon the pending clause of Rule XXIV and all amendments thereto be limited to five minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. Say one minute.

Mr. BURROWS. That of course relates only to pending amendments.

Mr. BLACKBURN. My motion relates to all amendments, pending and that may be offered.

Mr. BURROWS. Is it in order to limit debate on amendments not yet offered?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] if adopted, cut off debate upon any new clause that may be offered?

The SPEAKER. It would not. In the absence of objection, the House might agree to tie itself up by cutting off debate on all amendments to be offered; but that would have to be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I mean all amendments to the pending clause. Mr. BURROWS. On all pending amendments.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am making my own motion.

Mr. BURROWS. Yes; and I am making my objection to it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That you may do by your vote.

The SPEAKER. The rule only allows the cutting off of debate on pending amendments if there is objection.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Is that the practice of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled on that point.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Has that been the ruling of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. It has. The Chair has made that ruling since this report from the Committee on Rules has been pending.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Very well; then I modify my motion so as to limit debate upon the paragraph and pending amendments to one minute.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLACKBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the revision of the rules.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CARLISLE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate on this paragraph and pending amendments is limited to one minute.

Mr. WHITE. I have modified my amendment in such a form as I think will still be acceptable to the gentleman from Kentucky. I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

If this motion prevail on each alternate Friday pension bills or private bills for the relief of persons who are or have been soldiers, for causes growing out of their military service, on said Calendar, shall have precedence in consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CALDWELL] accept this amendment as modified?

Mr. CALDWELL. I do.

Mr. BAKER. With the permission of the Committee of the Whole, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, in the minute I have I wish to call attention to the fact that the pensions already granted if capitalized would amount to a debt of a thousand million of dollars, and is destined even under the law as it now stands to reach a sum much larger, at least for a time, requiring about $40,000,000 annually; and if it be intended, as has been intimated, to open wide the doors and let in every one who has served at all in the Army, then let us be honest and say so at once. We must be prepared, however, if we do that to see from seventy-five to a hundred millions of dollars taken annually from the Treasury to meet it, and taxes increased accordingly. Such a pension-roll as that step would lead to would, if capitalized, amount to more than the present national debt. On the other hand, if these cases are to be examined and relief limited to actual disability under the law, then I insist that our method of proceeding is a sham and a farce. It is utterly impracticable as all know to go over in this House and pass decently on even three hundred cases this session out of three thousand, and all others must be put off to another session, while to the Calendar is all the time being added ten cases to one that is disposed of.

Now, the Committee on Invalid Pensions can bring into the House and have passed a measure by which all this difficulty may be remedied, so that the soldier who has wounds and scars or other actual disability to show for it can get his pension dues without waiting till he is ready to die, and at the same time claims that are without merit, mere pretenses or wholly fraudulent, can be kept out. This is what as business men we ought to do.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HAYES. Is it in order to offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. HAYES. I offer the following:

After the word "and," in the third clause of the rule, insert "bills relating to pensioners and for the relief of soldiers and their representatives shall be considered in preference to any other."

This includes the cases of soldiers' widows and orphans who are not covered by the other proposition.

Mr. MAGINNIS. That would rule out bills reported from the Committee on Military Affairs to correct a soldier's record or anything of that kind.

Mr. WHITE. As I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HAYES,] it is confined to men now in the service. Mr. HAYES. Oh, no.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HAYES, it was not agreed to.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CALDWELL as modified by the acceptance of the amendment of Mr. WHITE, there were—ayes 64, noes 74.

Mr. WHITE called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CALDWELL and Mr. BLACKBURN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 76, noes 78.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. I move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to Rule XXIV the following:

When a public bill, resolution, or proposition shall have been referred to a standing or select committee of the House and no report has been made thereon for thirty days, it shall be in order for the member who introduced said bill, resolution, or proposition, on any Monday, after the call of the States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions, to offer a resolution or move to place said bill, resolution, or proposition on the proper calendar, which resolution shall then be considered, and, if decided in the affirmative, the bill, resolution, or proposition shall be placed on the Calendar, and the committee discharged from further consideration of the same.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment, in accordance with the notice I gave several weeks ago, as a remedy for an evil which I think exists, and which perhaps has escaped the observation of the Committee on Rules.

It is the undoubted right of every member upon this floor to offer a bill to redress any public grievance or for the public good when he comes here as a Representative. When he offers such a bill, under the rules it is referred to a committee. I take the incontrovertible position that when it is referred to a committee it is the duty of that committee to report the bill in some way, either to report it back favorably or unfavorably. But, instead of that being done, there are many instances which have occurred, and which are complained of, where bills have been referred to committees, and because the committees seemed to be opposed to them, they have refused to make any report on them whatever—either for or against them. In this way the bills are smothered. This is all wrong. It is one of the highest privileges of a member upon this floor to have a vote of this House upon any measure he presents for the public good. Well, how is he to get it if the committee refuses to report the bill at all? How can you force a committee under these rules to do it? If any gentleman will point out a remedy now existing I will withdraw my amendment.

But I have talked with old parliamentarians, with men as thoroughly versed in parliamentary rules, perhaps, as any gentleman upon this floor. They all agree upon one point, that if a bill is referred to a committee which is opposed to it and that committee does not see proper to report the bill back to the House, they can hold it up, and the only remedy is for a member to offer a resolution of this House instructing that committee to report back the bill. Now, at first blush, that would seem to be a proper remedy. But it amounts to nothing at all, because a member can never offer such a resolution or make such a motion except upon a Monday, after all the States and Territories have been called through for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions, before the expiration of the hour, and when during the remainder of that hour a second call is made for individual resolutions. I have been assured by members who have been upon this floor for the last twelve or fifteen years, that they never knew an instance of such a call to occur except once, and then when a motion was made it was lost by the interposition of a motion to adjourn, because it had no place on the Calendar and no place provided for it under the rules of this House.

Under the provision of the amendment I have offered, if a committee has had a public bill for thirty days and refuses to make any report on it, not a private, but a public bill, then the member may enter a motion on Monday, after the call of States and Territories has been completed, to put that bill on the Calendar, and that motion is then to be considered by the House, and, if they approve of it, it goes upon the Calendar; if not, that is the end of it. It seems to me it is a just and equitable provision. It is the only remedy I can conceive of.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment not only protects the rights of individual members on this floor, but it protects the rights of the majority, and prevents the will of the majority from being stifled and smothered by a committee. How can this House exercise its legislative functions except by a bill or joint resolution offered by some member? It is immediately referred to a committee, and the House cannot act upon that bill and give its sanction to it, no matter if there is a large majority in favor of it, until it is reported back by the committee either favorably or unfavorably; and if the committee is opposed to the bill and will not report it, they not only defeat the right of the member offering the bill or resolution, but they stifle and smother the voice of a majority of the representatives of the people. I assert, sir, that under the rules of this House as reported and as they are to-day in force a committee can exercise an unconstitutional power by withholding a bill which has been referred to them and which a majority is in favor of, and by this means prevent the will of a majority from being carried into a law for the public good. This is clearly contrary to the spirit of our Constitution, and yet it has been done and can be repeated. No such power ought to be in the hands of a committee; it is dangerous to the liberty of a free people. There ought to be some remedy provided such as I propose in this amendment. The will of a majority should control in this House, and it ought not to be in the power of any committee to stifle it, as it is under the present rules and those under consideration. The Constitution does not require two-thirds to pass a bill; a majority has the right under the Constitution, and the rules ought not to obstruct the will of a majority, or put it in the power of a committee to do it. Sir, I believe in the doctrine of "equal rights to all, exclusive privileges to none." I hope the House will adopt the amendment.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I offer this as an amendment to the amendment now pending.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "after call of States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions," and insert "immediately after the expiration of the morning hour."

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, it will be observed the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. OSCAR TURNER] is applicable only to public bills and joint resolutions, and not to bills of a private nature. The number of public bills is not so very large as many may imagine. Most of those introduced here are private bills. Therefore I do not believe this rule will be impracticable.

I have been here long enough, sir, to have learned the necessity for some such provision as this. I have known very important measures of a public nature brought in at an early day during the last Congress, which have been ignored by the committees to which they were referred, while they have instead devoted their time to the consideration of private bills. I know of some bills of a public nature which have been introduced into this Congress at the extra session and referred to important committees of this House, having proper jurisdiction of them, and which have never yet seen daylight so far as any report to this House is concerned, while the same committees nearly every time they have been called for reports have reported private bills, showing that considerable labor and care had been bestowed by the committees upon them.

Now, sir, I am one of those who believe that legislation should be of such character as will promote the greatest good to the greatest number, and that private bills should give way to public necessity. This amendment, in my judgment, would be in furtherance of that principle.

I can particularize many instances but will content myself with reference to only one or two. Before the holidays I introduced into this House a resolution directing the Committee on the Judiciary to report an amendment to the Constitution fixing a limit of six years for the presentation of claims against the Government of the United States. When we remember the fact that there are bills now pending in this Congress which have been introduced into every Congress since 1819—and although some of them have time and again been reported upon adversely they have been renewed in each recurring Congress and pressed again for action with a hope that they may slip through a new and negligent Congress—we can all see that if an amendment to the Constitution like that I suggested should be adopted, fixing a limit to the time for the presentation of these claims, it would settle forever the fate of many unjust and rotten claims and thereby save hundreds of millions of dollars in the future to the tax-payers of this country.

The old schemes to plunder the Treasury and the chronic claims will never die, for when death ends their prosecution by original claimants they are followed up by heirs, or by assignees, or claim-agent sharks, who have obtained control of them for insignificant sums. There is but one way to protect the people from such fraudulent or stale claims, and that is by the method I have suggested.

In another instance I introduced a resolution early in January instructing the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report upon the expediency of abolishing our useless diplomatic service. If a bill was reported from the committee for that purpose and passed by this House, we might in this Congress save over $300,000, being one-third the cost of our consular and diplomatic service, and rid ourselves of envoys extraordinary and ministers resident and their expensive appendages.

The intelligent public has long been convinced of the utter uselessness of our ornamental diplomatic corps. The cable and the present extraordinary rapid mail transportation facilities have enabled the metropolitan press to advise the Government and the public of every movement of foreign governments much more fully and much more speedily than any of our foreign missions. Indeed, it has been conceded by some of the highest officials in the Executive Departments that we can with safety dispense with this service. This would not embarrass the transaction of business between our Government and people with foreign countries, for that will be as effectively conducted by our consular service.

I refer to these two cases merely as illustrations. Neither of these resolutions has ever been reported from these committees. Now, what I want to accomplish is to give committees a fair opportunity to consider bills and resolutions referred to them. If they deem them unwise, let them report to the House, in order that the author may have an opportunity of getting the sense of the House upon them. If they are wise and advantageous to the country, they should not be buried in the committees. When committees fail to give proper attention to such important measures, either from disinclination or because overcrowded with work, this amendment will enable others, who are either more industrious or have more leisure, to secure action upon them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. I accept the amendment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. This is a very important amendment offered by my colleague, and I think it best that the House should see it in print to see what is its scope and the bearing it may have. I do not want any hasty action taken in any matter relating to this revision of the rules. If this amendment is adopted I think it will be found in the first place it is not as carefully worded as my colleague would like to have it. If it is adopted I think it will work an absolute revolution probably away beyond the scope he or any member of this House would propose to give it.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I will move now that the committee rise in order that this amendment may be pending when we shall meet to-morrow or when we next meet for the consideration of this revision of the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state before the committee rises that the gentleman from Kentucky has indicated his acceptance of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, as a modification of his.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. I have accepted it.

The CHAIRMAN. It is now moved by the gentleman from Kentucky that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the report of the Committee on Rules, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT TILL MONDAY.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. STEVENSON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. STEVENSON and Mr. DUNNELL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 109, noes 42.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 135.

Mr. DUNNELL. Monday is Washington's birthday and I suggest that instead of adjourning over to-morrow we have a session on that day, and then adjourn over until Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he has no option in the matter but must announce the result.

Mr. LOWE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. On the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota that when the House adjourns it adjourn to Monday next the yeas were 109, noes 42. On the demand for the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 31, which was one-fifth of the vote as counted on the previous division; but further count was demanded, when the yeas were 31, and the noes were 135, which is not a sufficient number to order the yeas and nays. So the yeas and nays are not ordered, and the motion to adjourn over is agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the House adjourned over until Monday next; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. TALBOTT, till Monday next, on account of important business.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, House bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 2003) for the relief of J. P. Zimmerman and H. P. Snow, of Clinton County, Kentucky; and

An act (H. R. No. 2785) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint a deputy collector at Lake Charles, Louisiana.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 2) for the relief of Mark Walker;

An act (S. No. 50) for the relief of James A. Barr;

An act (S. No. 180) for the relief of George V. Hebb;

An act (S. No. 286) for the relief of John S. Cunningham;

An act (S. No. 388) for the relief of Jacob B. King;

An act (S. No. 389) for the relief of Peter Phillips;

An act (S. No. 593) to repeal the provisions authorizing the advancement of an officer of the Navy or Marine Corps thirty numbers in rank for extraordinary heroism;

An act (S. No. 707) for the relief of William W. Ross;

An act (S. No. 843) providing for the delivery of dutiable articles in the mails and for indemnity for lost registered articles;

An act (S. No. 888) to authorize the compilation and printing of the Naval History of the War;

An act (S. No. 942) releasing the title of the United States in a certain parcel of land to John Cutler and his assigns;

An act (S. No. 996) for the relief of Monroe Donoho;
 An act (S. No. 1004) for the relief of the sureties of Henry L. Norvell;
 An act (S. No. 1088) for the relief of Claude H. Masten, surviving partner of the firm of Le Vert & Masten, of Mobile, Alabama, and the children of Octavia Le Vert, deceased; and An act (S. No. 1100) for the relief of Solomon Morris.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

On motion of Mr. ATHERTON, by unanimous consent, the privileges of the floor were extended to Hon. John F. Follett, ex-speaker of the house of representatives of the Legislature of Ohio, for three days.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. McKINLEY, by unanimous consent, the papers in the case of Richard H. Foutz were withdrawn from the files of the House and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. DIBRELL, by unanimous consent, it was ordered that the papers in the case of Asa Faulkner, now on file with the Committee of Ways and Means, be withdrawn and referred to the Committee of Claims, there being no adverse report thereon.

Mr. CONGER. In the first case, as I understand, it was not stated whether there was an adverse report.

The SPEAKER. It was not a request to withdraw papers from the files, but to refer papers to a committee from the files of the House.

JUDICIAL DISTRICTS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. KING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4630) to divide the State of Louisiana into two judicial districts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

The question being put on the motion to adjourn, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday next.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows, viz:

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 23, 1880.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, yesterday, being Sunday, was the 22d day of February and the birthday of George Washington. To-day being the first secular day thereafter, I move that the Senate do now adjourn in respect to his memory.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I second the motion, Mr. President.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware, which is not debatable.

Mr. McDONALD. I know that it is not a debatable motion; and I simply desire to give notice that to-morrow I shall ask for a final vote on Senate bill No. 19, which is now the unfinished business.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask the Senator from Delaware to give way for a moment to allow me to submit an amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. Very well.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the bill (H. R. No. 3288) for the relief of colored emigrants; and I move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at twelve o'clock and twelve minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 23, 1880.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

ADMISSIONS TO THE FLOOR.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is requested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. MORSE, to ask the privilege of the floor for Hon. F. O. Prince, mayor of Boston, and a committee of both branches of the city council of Boston during their stay in the city. The Chair is also requested by the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. DAVIS, to ask the same privilege for Mr. Jordan, of that State.

The being no objection, the requests were granted.

Mr. FROST. I make the same request on behalf of Mr. Naylor and Mr. Russell, members of the Missouri Legislature.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I make the same request for N. Van Slyck, city solicitor of Providence, Rhode Island, and a member of the democratic national committee.

Mr. RICHMOND. I make the same request on behalf of Hon. John T. Lovell, State senator of Virginia and chairman of the democratic State committee.

Mr. WILSON. I make the same request on behalf of Colonel Alexander Campbell, of West Virginia, a member of the democratic national committee.

Mr. STEPHENS. I ask the same privilege for George D. Barnes, of Georgia.

There being no objection, the several requests were granted.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. FROST, for two weeks, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty-five minutes past twelve o'clock. This being Monday, the first business in order during the morning hour is the call of States and Territories for the introduction on leave of bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees. During this call memorials and resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures are in order, and also resolutions calling for executive information, for reference to appropriate committees.

Mr. MCGINNIS. I rise to a question of order. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether the call will begin where it left off last Monday.

The SPEAKER. It will. Under the practice, for there is no rule on the subject, the call will commence where it left off last Monday with the State of Colorado. The equity of the practice is that each State shall have an equal number of calls. It is in analogy with the rule as to resuming business when the same class of business is reached.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask unanimous consent that the members of the national democratic executive committee, now in session in this city, be admitted to the privilege of the floor of the House during their stay here.

There being no objection, the request was granted.

DEATH OF HON. A. M. LAY.

Mr. PHILIPS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The hour of half past one o'clock having arrived, the Clerk will read the resolution of the House fixing the order of proceeding for that hour to-day.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the special order for Monday, February 23, at half past one o'clock, shall be the presentation of suitable resolutions on the death of Hon. A. M. LAY, late member of the Forty-sixth Congress, and the expression by the members of the esteem in which his memory is held.

Mr. PHILIPS. Mr. Speaker, even if no memorial occasion were present with its swelling tide of reflections, I would have been reminded on my return to this House, after a brief absence, that death had been busy here. I miss some well-remembered faces that on a yesterday all but were flushed with health and beaming with the pride of intellect. They have gone

The way to dusty death.

Broad as is that way, how it has been thronged in these latter years with Presidents, Senators, and Representatives.

As I come to-day to offer this tribute of respect upon the new-made grave of my lamented predecessor, a troop of recollections, sad and pleasing, pass in review before me. The innocence of childhood, the buoyancy of youth, the panting ambition of manhood, the charm and rapture of true love that made a heaven of his domestic life, the conflicts, defeats, and triumphs of the forum and the hustings, all pass before my view, and I see how well he lived and how untimely he died.

ALFRED MORRISON LAY was born May the 20th, A. D. 1836, in Lewis County, Missouri, and died in this city on the 8th day of December, A. D. 1879. He came of a parentage that belonged to the rugged, bold class of pioneers who, with no fortune but a stout heart and without patrimony or heraldry, crossed to the western bank of the Mississippi and drove back the savage and subdued the wilderness to make way for that splendid civilization which to-day points out Missouri among the constellation of States as the fifth in the American Union.

In 1842 he removed with his parents to Benton County, Missouri, and there drank the inspiration of his political tenets from the great Senator whose name this county bears. He graduated from Bethany College, Virginia, in 1856.

Selecting the law for his profession, he was admitted to the bar in 1857, and located at Jefferson City, the capital of the State. With such assiduity did he apply himself to his profession and such attainments had he made that in 1860 he was appointed United States district attorney for the western district of Missouri.

It was in the performance of the duties of this office that I first met him professionally and learned something of his rare qualities as a lawyer. This office he resigned in 1861. Yielding to what he and others in Missouri then believed to be a duty of obedience to the call of the governor of the State, he enlisted in the State Guards; and in the gathering storm of war then settling over the border line separating the slaveholding from the non-slaveholding States he was soon swept into the ranks of the confederate army. With his characteristic patience and fidelity he is represented to have served his cause as private and officer with admirable courage.

The war ending, he returned to his home, broken in fortune and under the ban of political proscription. He had, however, that proud legacy left, his personal honor and pride, and through the clouds of misfortune there shone the light of the glad smile of her who waited his coming, to bid him look now toward the high summit of glory in the ascending path of his profession. Accepting with philosophic resignation the fate of war, he bent his energies anew to the study and practice of the law and soon found his way to the front at a bar eminent for its talent. He may not have possessed the charm of popular oratory or that vehemence of temper that leads into mere declamation, but his logic was clear and forceful and his analysis was often complete. He knew the law and he knew men. These made him formidable before the judge on the bench and the jury in the box. Possessed of that innate kindness of heart and keen sense of the right which impart to human nature its fascination and nobility, he seldom gave offense, and drew to him troops of friends. His rank as a lawyer and personal popularity designated him as one most fit to aid his State in the reconstruction of its organic law. Accordingly he was elected a member of the constitutional convention of 1875, and the present constitution of the State, whatever be its merits, is in part the product of his labor and thought.

But not these, Mr. Speaker, were the goal of his ambition. He plumed his feathers and fixed his eye for another perch. His aim was to sit as a popular Representative in this hall. This he never disguised. It was the temple upon whose turret his eye was fastened from childhood. To him it was not the vain delusion that haunts the steps of vagrant youth. It was not a dizzy path, to be trodden only by the favorites of fortune. Nor was it that ambition called "the last infirmity of noble minds," nor the consciousness of any extraordinary destiny in store for the child of genius. But it was the salient point of attainment to a resolute, healthy mind, of a man self-poised and impelled by an honorable purpose.

How he fought and yielded not until he won his object is the highest evidence of his indomitable nature, and the best incentive his life has left on record to every American youth in whose breast burn the fires of laudable ambition.

Three successive canvasses he made for this office. Defeat, that would have crushed with disappointment or stung to sullen despair the pride of ordinary men, only roused the lion in him and set him furious for a renewal of the combat.

It was in the pursuit of the honors of a seat in this Hall that his health received its death-shock. The friction and tension of the struggle were too great for a delicate, nervous organism like his.

It was my fortune to be with him at his appointment in October, 1878, when he was first stricken with paralysis. That morning he was unusually buoyant in spirit. In the midst of his address, glowing with the fervor of his cause, a paralytic stroke, like electricity, shot through his frame, benumbing his left side and completely prostrating him. Impressed as he was with the belief that his hour had come, his self-possession was marked and his courage was splendid. But that which then shone out like quickening fire in his character, and sheds a halo of glory around the man and makes his memory most fragrant to me, was the abounding love he exhibited for wife and children.

The complications of varied business affairs, the honors and glories of the world, had little place then in his mind. The glamour of all these faded into nothingness in the one yearning, burning desire that lighted his soul like "the lambent purity of the stars," for the presence of her who had loved, trusted, and cheered him in poverty as in riches, in shadow as in sunshine. Only if he could but fold her and the precious fruit of their wedded life to his bosom once more, he was ready to descend, as calm and intrepid as the grand marshal of Saxony, to his untimely grave. What a bright and beautiful page this is in the history of this man! It is as to all that might be writ or wrought on this national theater as the diamond to the ruby.

From this first attack Mr. LAY rallied but never recovered. Anxious to justify public expectation and to serve his party in its critical conjuncture, he came here and took his seat, only to realize in part the dream and desire of his life; for here he died in the shadow of the Capitol and in the arms of his wife.

You, his fellow-members, were not permitted to test the quality of his mind, nor to feel the mesmerism of his social nature. Nor was the country allowed to know what he might have done for it.

I know he would have done his duty faithfully and well. Eminently practical and conservative he had no visionary notions or a single atom of fanaticism in his political creed. He would have proven equally exempt from that rash spirit of empiricism which would tear to pieces the existing frame of society in quest of mere abstractions, and that coward spirit which would temporize with a palpable evil in government until it spread like a cancer over the body-politic, rather than put the knife to its root.

Conspicuous among his cluster of virtues were his candor and frankness. He was a close friend and an open enemy. As odor to the flower and azure to the sky, was truth to him. As gentle as a woman in repose, he was as stalwart as a grenadier in action. Nothing he sought for or won had the canker of lust or the breath of poison upon it. Faults and imperfections he had, for he was human. But he so lived and died as to little need the seal of the sepulcher to exclude "from its slumbering tenant the breath of envy" or reproach. He sleeps his last sleep at the seat of government of his native State, in sight of his consecrated home. As the dew of heaven, morning and evening, keeps redolent the flower, so the fond recollection of the multitudes who knew him, and the matin prayer and vesper hymn of the widowed heart, will not let his good name fade away.

Death has its conquest and the grave its gloom, but there is a victory over both.

All human bodies yield to Death's decree.
The soul survives to all eternity.

Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.
The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this House has heard with profound regret of the death of Hon. ALFRED M. LAY, late a member of this House from the State of Missouri.

Resolved, That as a testimonial of respect to his memory the officers and members of this body will wear the usual badge of mourning for the space of thirty days.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the Clerk of this House to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to communicate a copy of these proceedings to the Senate, and that, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the House do now adjourn.

Mr. KNOTT. One of the most pleasing characteristics of humanity is the universal disposition among men to honor their dead, to perpetuate the memory of their virtues while kindly covering their frailties with the beauteous mantle of charity. It is one of the remnants of a celestial nature left to a fallen race, and belongs to all classes and conditions of mankind. It is voiced alike in the funeral chant of the untutored savage and the wailing requiem that swells with its flood of mournful melodies the obsequies of the great. It is seen in the rude stone that marks the last resting-place of the toil-worn peasant and in the marble pomp that hides the moldering dust of departed grandeur.

In obedience to this generous impulse, as honorable to our nature as it is natural to the human heart, we have again paused in the midst of our labors here to testify our appreciation of the virtues illustrated in the life and character of one whom the "silent reaper" has taken from among us, and I ask the melancholy privilege of seconding the resolutions offered by the distinguished gentleman who has been chosen to succeed him upon the new theater of usefulness and honor he barely entered when summoned to a sphere beyond the dark waters of death.

There is no one on this floor, indeed, upon whom that mournful duty could be more appropriately devolved. My acquaintance with Mr. LAY commenced more than twenty years ago, and was rendered by the peculiar circumstances surrounding us more than ordinarily intimate and pleasant. He had but recently been graduated from Bethany College, Virginia, and prepared for the bar by a course of study in the office and under the tutelage of the then attorney-general for Missouri, and was just entering the arena of active manhood, with every promise of the successful professional career he subsequently achieved. He was shortly afterward appointed to the office of United States district attorney for the western district of Missouri, which he filled with marked ability and distinction for one so young until 1861, when he resigned.

Soon after I had the pleasure of forming his acquaintance he led to the marriage altar the object and idol of his youthful love, one of the most beautiful and accomplished daughters of his native Commonwealth, a lady whose charms of person and brilliancy of intellect were equaled only by her own amiability of disposition and nobility of soul, and who, as a wife, proved herself the choicest blessing God ever vouchsafed to man. In hope she was ever his bright incentive, in the hour of triumph she was his joy, in prosperity his pride, in adversity his solace, in pain and anguish his support, in all his constant companion, his guardian angel, his heaven-sent friend. "The beauteous vine which had twined itself so tenderly about the stalwart young oak, its ornament in the bright sunshine of joy, still clung with its loving tendrils to the shattered fragments when the stately tree was riven by the tempests of misfortune." When first I met them hand in hand, with their young hearts elate with joy and hope, they were radiant with the approving smiles of angels looking down upon them. When I saw them last, the still loving wife was bending in anguish over the cold, pale form of the husband to whom she had devoted her love and her life.

Intimately associated with Mr. LAY as I was, I enjoyed the amplest opportunities for becoming acquainted with the more prominent of his intellectual qualities as well as with the principles upon which his character was formed. His mind was at once acute and comprehensive, inclining more to solidity and usefulness than to mere brilliancy and ornament. His methods of thought were careful and painstaking, and his conclusions accurate and reliable. Never ostentatious or self-suggestive in asserting his opinions, his convictions were unusually strong, and never abandoned unless his judgment was clearly convinced of their incorrectness. He was consequently a man of singular decision of character, acting in everything from a conscientious sense of duty. His prompt, faithful, self-sacrificing obedience to this great motor of his nature was perhaps the most distinguished trait in a character remarkable among his acquaintances from his earliest manhood. What a deliberate conviction of duty dictated to be done he attempted at every hazard or at any sacrifice of personal convenience or comfort.

His heroic fidelity to his sense of duty was most strikingly illustrated by his course on the breaking out of the late unfortunate war between the States. He acted in that fearful emergency from no rash impulse, he was influenced by none of the allurements of military glory or political aggrandizement, but proceeded to consider calmly, coolly, and dispassionately what duty demanded at his hands, and his conclusion once attained, he closed his eyes to every other earthly consideration, to every thought of personal ease, to every aspiration of professional ambition, to the embraces of his young and beauteous wife, to the angelic smiles of his first-born babe, and all the endearments that clustered about his own happy hearth-stone, and, with his life in his hand, with sorrow, privation, toil, imprisonment, and death before him, entered the ranks of the confederate army as a private soldier, where the same courageous devotion to duty raised him to the rank of major.

I know something of the struggle that conclusion cost him, but from the moment it was reached I never saw him again until I met him at the opening of the extra session of the present Congress, where, impelled by the same supreme motive which had controlled him through life, he had dragged his shattered and emaciated form to the post of duty. What he might have achieved under the influence of such a sublime devotion to his convictions in the new arena to which he had been chosen had he not been cut down upon the threshold can now be only a theme for pleasing speculation.

As a citizen Mr. LAY was an ornament to the community in which he lived—intelligent, public-spirited, generous, honorable, and dignified. As a soldier he was courageous and faithful. As a lawyer he was learned, able, careful, and unswerving in his fidelity to his clients. As a friend he was candid, sincere, and disinterested. As a husband and father he was gentle, tender, and affectionate; and in all the relations of life he was modest, courteous, and truthful—

*Cui Pudor et Justitiæ soror,
Incorrupta Fides, undaque veritas
Quando ullum inveniet parem?*

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, it is painful when we come to pay the last sad tribute of respect to any departed associate and friend, but how much more poignant and bitter is the sorrow when we join in the memorial services of one struck down in the very beginning of a career so full of honorable promise of usefulness to his country and of just renown to himself. In no instance is this more true than in that of our lamented friend whose death we here to-day commemorate. I knew him from his boyhood when, studious and patient, he prepared himself for admission to the bar, buoyed up with the hope that eminence some day would crown his efforts in the legal profession. When he came to practice he was faithful, painstaking, exact in the preparation of his cases for trial. And when, at the early age of twenty-four, as the reward of systematic and energetic application, President Buchanan appointed him United States district attorney for the western district of Missouri, it was deemed by his professional brethren as deserved. He discharged the duties of this position with justness, fidelity, and applause until 1861, when he resigned it. Then civil war had begun. In the execution of a duty conscientious and deliberate he took sides and with all the energy and enthusiasm of his nature went to work to organize the State Guards of Missouri for the purpose of co-operating with the forces of the Confederate States.

In this reference it is not my purpose to discuss whether Mr. LAY was right or wrong in taking the part of the South. As a fact he and his companions joined their fortunes with that side, submitting the result to the dread arbitrament of the sword, and although defeat came with all its humiliation, it was nevertheless accepted in good faith, and no man was more earnest than he in consigning to forgetfulness and deep oblivion the heart-burnings and gloomy episodes of the past. My motive is not to recall the horrors of this bloody and unfortunate page of our national history, but I cannot forget that amid these stormy scenes I first grew intimate with Mr. LAY, and learned to love him for the generous, manly, noble traits which were so characteristic of him. We stood together on many hard-fought fields of battle. We bivouacked under the same tree, often slept under the same blanket, shared the same scanty meal, endured the same hardships, were lifted up with the same hope, depressed by like disaster; we were indeed companions in arms, and when upon the same stricken field we surrendered our swords, we started together for our old homes, five hundred miles away, without money, threadbare, and sick at heart. He was tried in the furnace of war only to prove the fineness and purity of the metal of which he was made; and thus I knew him. His heart was tender as a girl's, and none wept more sincerely over the wounded and suffering foe than he did. If he were here to speak for himself it would be in honest applause of the endurance and courage of the Union soldiers. His aspect to the captive was as gentle as it was fierce and defiant to the enemy. He was the type of citizen, soldier, man which has added new wealth of honor to our national character.

When Mr. LAY at the close of the war resumed the practice of the law at his old home, he was surrounded with clients. He was trusted and admired as much by Union soldiers as by his old comrades.

His duty was a religion to him. What he believed to be right, that he did with all his force. His election to this House was considered doubtful. He put forth all his energies, mental and physical. Success came, but overwork had prostrated Mr. LAY upon a bed of sickness. From this attack he never entirely recovered. He was never able to enter upon the active discharge of the duties of his position of Representative upon this floor from the State of Missouri. If he had been spared he would have been, if not brilliant and pre-eminent, at least faithful, honest, able. His mild demeanor and unquestioned sincerity would have won all hearts.

What he would have been in the full fruition of his developed powers we can only conjecture. Opportunity is everything for those who are tutored to high purposes and stimulated by an honest ambition to achieve success. To the unremitting toil of such men triumph comes as a matter of course. Mr. LAY cherished in his youth the fond expectation of one day sitting in the national Legislature as the representative of his people; it strengthened with his increasing years, and when the honor so long sought came to him it turned like Dead Sea apples to ashes upon his lips. The world's greatest men were of the material which made up his character, and what might not his courage, lofty aim, unbroken patience and noble resolve have accomplished? His was no vainglorious nature, swaying to the hopes and fears of demagogues, but he forgot self and gave himself up to the accomplishment of what he really believed was the highest good of his country.

He was true in all the relations of life. His sweetness and amiability were beautifully illustrated in the tender solicitude he always manifested for his wife and children. His affection for them sprang from a deep and manly heart. The last faint trembling accents ere his spirit took its flight were a prayer for their protection.

Mr. Speaker, thousands of hearts in his district which beat with pride at the mention of his name grew sad and desolate when his death was announced; and when on a cold December morning his remains were consigned to the grave the crowd of people who stood by poured from full hearts the rich tribute of their sorrow for a man whom they had so truly loved.

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, in summing up the record of any public career it is of all things most gratifying to be able to say that it was an earnest and unselfish career; that its progress was marked by a single desire to elevate and bless the generation in which its lot was cast. And scarcely less gratifying is it to remember that amid the many and strong temptations to attain popularity and preferment which surround such a life they had never been purchased at the cost of dishonor; that the glittering allurements of popular favor or public distinction were impotent to swerve it from the clear line of right and duty. That these were the distinctive and distinguishing characteristics of him whose loss we mourn all hearts will attest. I claim not for him a soaring genius, formed to blaze with meteoric splendor through the intellectual firmament of his age; but I am satisfied to believe him the author of many a noble deed whose luster shall stream through eternity. It is not my desire to rest his claims to our consideration on the greatness of his talents, for I remember that the best and most enduring work of this world is its heart-work; and I risk nothing when I assert that it is to modest talent, well directed, rather than to brilliant genius, that mankind is indebted for its substantial benefits. It is the great middle class of patient, faithful plodders, (men who in their sphere, however lowly or obscure, do their work noiselessly and conscientiously,) whose hands reap for us the golden harvest of human blessings. It is such as these that give character to an age and infuse vitality into the influences that mold the epochs of history.

In this category of noble workmen I prefer to class our departed friend. To many he was known as a man of generous impulses, warm-hearted and steadfast in friendship. To all he was known as a man faithful to his trusts, vigilant in the discharge of every duty, ambitious only for the triumph of the right, never seeking or desiring a victory that could not be won with honor and retained with dignity.

As a member of the vast rank and file of enlightened American citizens he knew the needs and sympathized with the heart-beats of the masses. Ever keenly alive to their highest interests he saw intuitively and resisted with all the power of his large heart and clear brain any attempt to imperil the freedom or impair the rights of his countrymen. And the force of his sterling manhood rose up instinctively but unostentatiously and stood like a wall between their interests and every baleful influence that threatened to assail them. And in all this broad land which freemen tread liberty, truth, and justice found no more steadfast and uncompromising champion.

Generous, humane, and gentle by nature, he was intolerant only of that which no true man should tolerate. Conscientious, pure in heart, of spotless integrity, and firmly grounded in Christian faith, his life was a triumphant vindication of human nature when directed by intelligence, wisdom, and virtue.

When some men die—when most men die, we are constrained to offset the evil they did by the good we know of them; we hasten, in a Christian spirit, to forget that which it is painful or ungenerous to remember; but we have no need to invoke the shadows of oblivion to fall on any of the paths his footsteps trod.

He has gone from among us. We desire to honor his memory. Can we better accomplish this desire than by striving to imitate his high example, to the end that the world shall not be a loser by his departure? A noble determination to emulate his character is the best conceivable method of perpetuating the memory of him we so reverently cherish.

The resolutions submitted by Mr. PHILLIPS, of Missouri, were unanimously adopted; and in obedience to the concluding resolution, the House (at two o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 24, 1880.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers inclosing a copy of a report from Major William E. Merrill, Corps of Engineers, upon a survey and examination of the Allegheny River from French Creek to Olean, made in compliance with the river and harbor act of March 3, 1879; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the Senate of the 19th instant, a copy of Executive Document No. 47, Forty-sixth Congress, second session, being a report submitted by him, under date of January 14 ultimo, in compliance with the law referred to in the resolution of the Senate; which was ordered to lie on the table.

LANDS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. VEST. I present a petition of James Charley, David Geboe, Me-tah-con-sa-quah, and others, chiefs, headmen, and heads of families of the confederated Peoria and Miami tribes of Indians of the Quapaw agency, Indian Territory, praying that such legislation may be had by Congress as will abolish the tenure in common by which their lands are now held, and giving them title to said lands in severalty.

Mr. President, I have been requested by a delegation of the united Peoria and Miami tribes of Indians, now in this city, to present this petition and ask for it the attention of the Senate. These tribes own fifty thousand and three hundred and one acres of land lying immediately south of Cherokee County, Kansas, and they ask that the tenure in common by which they now hold these lands may be changed to a tenure in severalty, and they be permitted to sell the surplus of land allotted to each member of the tribes over and above a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres for such price as the owners may be able to obtain.

Mr. President, there has been so much misrepresentation in regard to the Indian Territory and the proposed legislation with reference to it that I shall not attempt at this time to even make allusion to the many misstatements upon this subject by ignorant or interested parties. This petition is but one proof out of many that at an early date the condition of that Territory must receive the consideration of Congress. It has been repeatedly stated by the public press that the Indians themselves were satisfied with the present status of the Territory, and that the only agitation came from outside lobbies in the interest of railroads and land-jobbers. But two days ago I noticed in the Chicago Inter-Ocean the statement that Jay Gould had a large lobby in this city to secure the passage of a bill establishing a United States court in the Indian Territory.

This statement is absolutely false, without the slightest foundation. There has been no lobby, not even a single lobbyist here in the interest of that bill. The only lobby present in Washington for the purpose of influencing legislation in regard to the Indian Territory, within my knowledge, has been the so-called delegation from the Indian Territory, who at each recurring session of Congress punctually attend, and patriotically receive therefor some twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars of the money paid to the Indian nations by the Government. It has been the custom to declare that the Indian tribes desired no interference with their land tenure, and I present to-day this memorial signed by all the chiefs, headmen, and heads of families of the Peorias and Miamis, to show what reliance can be placed upon these statements. I am informed that five other tribes at the Quapaw agency propose sending delegations to Washington for a similar purpose, and I am glad to believe, that notwithstanding the systematic attempts of designing men to deceive and mislead them, the Indians are rapidly realizing the truth that forty-one millions of acres of the best land upon this continent cannot remain a blank upon the map of civilization, a Botany Bay, and, for all practical purposes, a desert. They are realizing the fact that they must provide homes for their wives and little ones, and that is the object of the memorial.

Mr. President, it seems to me the man is a lunatic who does not see that the Indian Territory cannot remain in its present condition. At the extra session the President issued his proclamation against an invasion of that territory by persons unauthorized to settle there; and but a few days since he was impelled by a sense of duty to repeat it. The Army is to-day required to enforce these proclamations, and each recurring spring the force must be increased. Sir, I advocate and defend no lawless invasion, no disregard of treaty stipulations, but I simply declare what I believe when I say that this can have but one termination. The history of the acquisition of all our territory from Plymouth Rock to the Rio Grande teaches the lesson that with men, as with other animals, the great rule prevails of the "survival of the fittest," and under this rule fate decrees that the white races must possess the continent.

Mr. President, I shall indulge in no sentimentality, but I declare myself a friend of the Indian and anxious for his welfare. Believing that he must yield to the inevitable, and that the Indian country must be opened to civilization, I am anxious to enact such laws as will honestly and equitably, without violating any treaty, remove this constant irritation from the borders of Missouri and at the same time do complete justice to the Indian tribes. I believe that the Committee on Territories have perfected a bill which will effect this purpose.

In the mean time I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. VEST presented the memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of Saint Joseph, Missouri, asking for an appropriation to construct a dredge-boat invented by F. M. Mahan, of Missouri; which was referred to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River and its Tributaries.

He also presented the memorial of Chauncey Ives, chief engineer of the Missouri Central Railroad Company, representing one hundred and fifty miles of railroad, remonstrating against a reduction of the duty on steel rails from $28 to $10 a ton, as proposed in House bill No. 3234; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions from more than five thousand citizens of Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, and Texas, praying for such legislation by Congress as may be necessary to open the Indian Territory to settlement upon terms just to the Indian tribes and honorable to the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. FERRY presented the memorial of Ferdinand F. Waite and 23 others, discharged Union soldiers of the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill No. 496, otherwise known as the sixty-surgeons bill; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ROLLINS presented the petition of Amos Paul, agent of the Swanscot Machine Company, and others, citizens of Newmarket, Rockingham County, New Hampshire, and the petition of George E. Fifield and others, citizens of Newmarket, Rockingham County, New Hampshire, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the Exeter River in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of John M. Hill and others, citizens of New Hampshire; the petition of W. P. Fiske and others, citizens of New Hampshire; the petition of John H. George and others, citizens of New Hampshire; the petition of Hubert F. Norris and others, citizens of New Hampshire; the petition of Mason W. Tappan and others, citizens of New Hampshire, and the petition of E. D. Rand and others, citizens of New Hampshire, praying for the removal of the United States circuit and district courts from Exeter to Concord, in that State; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of J. M. Bennett and others, citizens of New York, soldiers and sailors, and widows of soldiers and sailors of the late war, praying for the equalization of bounties, and that the same be granted at the rate of $100 per year for the time served, less the Government bounty already paid; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of H. P. Witherstine & Co., publishers of the Herkimer Democrat, Herkimer, New York, praying for the passage of a bill placing wood and straw pulp, soda-ash, and other chemicals used in the manufacture of paper on the free list, and to reduce the duty on printing-paper used for books, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PLATT presented the petition of William F. Graham, publisher of the Meriden (Connecticut) Daily and Weekly Republican, praying for a reduction of the duty on printing-paper; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Joseph C. Wiley and 50 others, citizens of Litchfield County, Connecticut, who were soldiers and sailors in the late war, praying for the passage of a bill for the equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BALDWIN presented the petition of Roe Stephens, publisher of the Amphion newspaper, of Detroit, Michigan, praying for a reduction of the duty on printing-paper, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUTLER presented the petition of James A. Edwards, W. K. Edwards, and 108 others, citizens residing in the valley of the Savannah River, praying for an appropriation to improve the navigation of that river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of William M. Thomas, of Charleston, South Carolina, praying for compensation for losses alleged to have been sustained by him by the sale of his factory by the United States Government under the provisions of the cotton-tax law; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a letter from Hon. George S. Bryan, judge of the United States district court for the district of South Carolina, addressed to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, urging the importance and necessity of a United States court-house in the city of Greenville, South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. JONAS. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana in favor of an appropriation for the opening and dredging of the channel of the mouth of the Red River. I ask that it be read.

The resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

Joint resolution requesting our Senators and Representatives in Congress to secure the passage by the Congress of the United States of a bill appropriating a sufficient sum of money for the opening and dredging of the channel of the mouth of Red River.

Whereas the mouth of the Red River is, at certain times, in such condition that it needs dredging to secure a deeper channel;

Whereas it is of the utmost necessity to secure a channel of a certain depth for the commercial interest of the State of Louisiana;

SECTION 1. Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be respectfully requested to use their best efforts toward securing the passage, at an early day, of an appropriation by the National Government sufficient to open said channel.

SEC. 2. Be it further resolved, etc., That a copy of this resolution be forwarded by the governor of the State of Louisiana, under the seal of the State, to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

R. M. OGDEN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
S. D. MCENERY,
Lieutenant-Governor and President of the Senate.

Approved February 14, 1880.

LOUIS A. WILTZ,
Governor of the State of Louisiana.

A true copy.
[SEAL.]

WILL A. STRONG, Secretary of State.

Mr. SLATER presented a petition of Simpson Brothers and others, citizens of the customs district of Southern Oregon, praying that the same may be created an inspection district, and also praying for the appointment of an inspector of hulls and boilers to reside at Coos Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLUMB presented the memorial of J. C. Rummel and others, citizens of Kansas and soldiers of the late war, and the memorial of Perry N. Tuttle and others, citizens of Kansas and soldiers of the late war, remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill No. 496, commonly known as the sixty-surgeons bill; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Amos Chapman, resident at Camp Supply, Indian Territory, praying that a pension may be granted him for distinguished service performed during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VOORHEES presented the petition of James R. Bennett and others, citizens of Indiana and soldiers in the late war, praying for the passage of a law for the equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Lewis Cooper and others, citizens of Patoka, Gibson County, Indiana, and soldiers in the late war, praying that they may be paid the difference between the value of greenbacks and gold at the time they were paid during the war; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GROOME presented the petition of W. W. Davis and 153 others, citizens of Cecil County, Maryland, praying for an appropriation to deepen the channel of the Northeast River, in Cecil County, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GROOME. I present joint resolutions of the General Assembly of Maryland, in favor of the removal of obstructions in the harbor at Annapolis, in that State. I ask that they be read.

The joint resolutions were read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

Joint resolutions of the General Assembly of Maryland relative to the removal of the obstructions to the harbor of Annapolis.

Whereas the Government of the United States of America has expended large sums of money in erecting buildings and enlarging the grounds of the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis and in purchasing ground and erecting buildings for experimental purposes connected with the Navy at Fort Madison; and

Whereas it is desirable that the bars which cause an obstruction to United States and other vessels of large draught in entering the harbor of Annapolis should be removed, or cut away, so as to admit said vessels with more facility and without danger of grounding on said bars, and also for the purpose of commerce; and

Whereas a reasonable expenditure of money for the purpose above mentioned would be, in the judgment of this General Assembly, both wisdom and economy: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of Maryland, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested and urged to use all proper means in their power to induce Congress to make an appropriation to deepen the entrance to the harbor of Annapolis by cutting away said bars.

Resolved, That his excellency the governor be requested to transmit to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions, that they may be laid before the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

HERMAN STUMP, Jr.,
President of the Senate.
HIRAM MCCULLOUGH,
Speaker of the House of Delegates.

Mr. ALLISON. I present a memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, relating to what is known as the Des Moines River grant. The Vice-President presented a similar memorial, which was read at length a few days since. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I also present a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, in relation to interstate commerce, which I ask be read.

The joint resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

Joint resolution in relation to interstate commerce.

Resolved by the General Assembly of Iowa, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to use all their influence to secure the enactment by Congress of a law that will inaugurate a system of controlling railroad corporations so as to prevent abuses in management, unjust discrimination, and excessive charges for transportation on all interstate lines of railroads.

2. Resolved, That the secretary of state be instructed to furnish a copy of this resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Approved February 16, 1880.

Mr. GORDON. I present the petition of Generals Winfield S. Hancock, H. G. Wright, H. W. Slocum, and a large number of other officers, praying that certain data regarding the battle of Gettysburgh be collected and published. Accompanying this petition are a large number of similar petitions from various officers of the Union Army, as well as those of the late confederate army, on the same subject. I move that these petitions be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GORDON presented additional papers to accompany the bill (S. No. 1134) to repay to the State of Georgia $27,175.50, money advanced by said State for the defense of her frontier against the Indians and not heretofore repaid; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WALLACE. I present a resolution of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, in favor of the passage of an electoral law. As the resolution is brief, I ask that it may be read and referred to the select committee having that subject in charge.

The resolution was read, and referred to the Select Committee to take into consideration the state of the law respecting the ascertaining and declaration of the result of the Elections of President and Vice-President of the United States, as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, February 18, 1880.

At a meeting of the Philadelphia Board of Trade held on 16th instant, the following resolution was submitted, and, upon motion, was unanimously approved by the board, namely:

Resolved, That the business interests of the country imperatively demand the immediate consideration and action of Congress in passing an electoral law providing for a prompt settlement of any disputed election of a President of the United States.

It was further resolved that copies of the above resolution be transmitted to Congress.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN WELSH, President.
GEO. L. BUZBY, Secretary.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented a petition of J. F. Boyer and 98 others, citizens of Middletown, Dauphin County, Pennsylvania, praying the passage of a bill to equalize the pay of the soldiers and sailors who served in the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of John L. Good and 39 others, citizens of Middletown, Dauphin County, Pennsylvania, praying the passage of what is known as the equalization bounty bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the memorial of James I. Bennett, president of the Pittsburgh and Lake Erie Railroad Company, representing seventy-one miles of railroad, and the memorial of Thomas B. Kennedy, president of the Cumberland Valley Railroad Company, and George B. Wiestling, superintendent of the Mont Alto Railroad, representing one hundred and forty-three miles of railroad, remonstrating against a reduction of the duty on steel rails from $28 to $10 a ton, as proposed in House bill No. 3234; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LOGAN presented the memorial of T. B. Blackstone, president of the Chicago and Alton Railroad Company, representing six hundred and seventy-eight miles of railroad; the memorial of F. W. Kinderkoper, president of the Chicago and Eastern Illinois Railroad Company, representing one hundred and fifty-two miles of railroad, and the memorial of J. B. Brown, president of the Chicago and Western Indiana Railroad Company, remonstrating against a reduction of the duty on steel rails from $28 to $10 a ton, as proposed in House bill No. 3234; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of John Cox, of Montgomery County, Ohio, late sergeant of Company H, Twentieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, praying to be placed on the invalid pension roll; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Charles M. Cadwallader and others, citizens of McDonough County, Illinois, praying for the passage of a special act granting a pension to the minor children of Second Lieutenant James Depoy, late of Company A, Fifty-fourth Ohio Infantry; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of John T. Cummins and others, citizens of Rose Hill, Jasper County, Illinois, and soldiers in the late war, praying for the passage of a law for the equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of James H. Williams and others, citizens of Illinois and soldiers in the late war, praying for the passage of a law for the equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Robert Duncan and others, citizens of Illinois and soldiers in the late war, praying for the passage of a law for the equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LOGAN. I also present resolutions in the nature of a memorial from the Board of Trade of the city of Chicago, in favor of an appropriation for the completion of the improvements of Saint Mary's River. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD without being read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Commerce; and are as follows:

Whereas it is represented to this board that the depth of water in the Saint Mary's River is quite insufficient to float the larger class of vessels now engaged in the trade with Lake Superior, thereby causing great delay and unnecessary expense in conducting the rapidly increasing commerce of this portion of the great lakes; and

Whereas the necessities of trade demand the early completion of the improvements now in progress in the Saint Mary's Ship-Canal, which, with the proper deepening of the river, will enable the largest class of lake vessels to engage in the Lake Superior trade; and

Whereas the deepening of the channel at the Lime Kiln Crossing in the Detroit River, as contemplated by the Engineer Department of the Government, is of great and pressing importance to the vast commerce of the lakes passing that point: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That in view of the great importance of these works the Congress of the United States is earnestly requested to make prompt and adequate appropriations for their early completion.

Resolved, That the president of this board be requested to appoint a committee to proceed to Washington and press upon the appropriate committees of Congress the urgent necessity for such action at the present session in respect to the above improvements as will insure their early completion.

In accordance with the authority conferred by the last of the above resolutions, the president of the board appointed as the committee contemplated the following gentlemen, namely: Jesse Spalding, O. W. Potter, W. M. Egan, R. D. Armour.

A copy from the records of the board.

CHARLES RANDOLPH, Secretary.

CHICAGO, February 2, 1880.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of Solomon M. King and others, citizens of the State of Illinois, and soldiers who served in the Union Army in the late war, praying for the passage of a bill for the equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of L. H. Brock and others, citizens of Illinois, and soldiers who served in the Union Army in the late war, praying Congress not to pass the bill (S. No. 496) for the examination and adjudication of pension claims; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of L. B. Dougherty and others, citizens and ex-soldiers of Mercer County, Illinois, praying the passage of the bill known as the Weaver bill, paying the soldiers the difference between gold and greenbacks at the time of their receiving their pay during the war; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BLAIR presented a memorial of the New York National Guard Association, remonstrating against the passage of what is known as the national militia bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the memorial of Hon. Albert R. Hatch, General Gilman Marston, and others, attorneys and counselors of the courts of the United States in the district of New Hampshire, remonstrating against the removal of the place of holding the United States courts from Exeter to Concord, New Hampshire; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MCPHERSON presented the petition of Boyer & Kaufman, publishers of the Hudson County Journal, at Hoboken, New Jersey, praying for the abolition of the tariff duties upon printing type and paper; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a petition of citizens of McDonald County, Missouri, praying for the passage of a law regulating interstate commerce; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COCKRELL. I also desire to present the petition of some five thousand citizens of Missouri, residing in forty-seven different counties, urging the importance of cane-growing in the United States for the manufacture of sugar and sirup, asking such legislation as will furnish protection and encouragement to the same, and most earnestly and persistently urging Congress not to enact any law granting a renewal or extension of patents now in use upon any article or machinery for the manufacture of sugar or sirup. They say such an extension or renewal would give control to a few to enrich themselves at the sacrifice of an important industry of the country. I call the special attention of the Committee on Patents to this respectable petition, and trust that they will act in accordance with its request. I move its reference to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. There have been submitted to me by Mr. C. M. Carter, an attorney of this city, certain papers, evidence in the matter of the bill (S. No. 714) for the relief of W. H. Barnhart. I desire to present them to the Senate that they may be referred properly to the Committee on Claims, and be before that committee by proper authority.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT. The papers will be so referred.

Mr. FARLEY presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of California, remonstrating against the proposed Franco-American commercial treaty for the reduction of American tariffs upon all French products, such as silk, woolen, iron, and glass manufactures, and wines and brandies; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of an appropriation by Congress of $30,000 for dredging and otherwise improving Humboldt Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. COKE presented a petition of citizens of McLennan and Falls Counties, Texas, praying such an amendment of the patent laws as will protect innocent users of patented articles from prosecution as infringers; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented a petition of citizens of McLennan and Falls Counties, Texas, praying for such legislation as will prevent fluctuations in freights and unjust discriminations in charges for transportation; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TELLER presented additional papers in reference to the claim of H. A. W. Tabor, late postmaster at Leadville, Colorado; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a letter from the Acting Commissioner of the General Land Office, and also one from himself, relative to the right of J. H. Pinkerton to file for and enter public lands under the pre-emption laws; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, presented the petition of F. B. Mills, of Lincoln, Illinois, publisher of the Lincoln Herald, and the petition of Aug. Geringer and 5 others, publishers of German newspapers, of Chicago, Illinois, praying for the passage of a law placing wood and straw pulp, soda-ash, and other chemicals used in the manufacture of paper, on the free list, and to reduce the duty on printing-paper used for books, &c.; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. A couple of weeks ago, in submitting some remarks on the Geneva award bill, I took occasion to say that I was not aware of any citizens in the State of Illinois being interested in the subject; but I have received a petition which convinces me otherwise. I beg leave to present the petition of Francis H. Kales and 39 others, citizens of Chicago, Illinois, praying Congress to pass some legislation which will give to all rightful claimants to the Alabama fund an opportunity to present their claims to some properly constituted tribunal. Inasmuch as the bill is pending I move that the petition lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1031) for the relief of Edward T. Benton, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 916) to authorize the United States to secure a title to certain military and timber reservations, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 81) to make the 23d day of February, 1880, a legal holiday in the District of Columbia, reported adversely thereon; and the joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the select committee to investigate and report the best means of preventing the introduction and spread of epidemic diseases, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1182) to increase the efficiency of the National Board of Health, reported it with amendments.

Mr. PRYOR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 170) for the relief of Tolley and Eaton, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. EATON. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 29) providing for a treaty of reciprocity and commerce with the Republic of France, ask to be discharged from its further consideration, believing that the matter ought properly to be in the hands of another department of the Government. We therefore recommend its indefinite postponement.

The joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1125) to provide for building a market-house on square 446 in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 853) to pay members of certain military organizations therein named, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1087) for the relief of John F. Clancey, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 933) for the relief of Edward S. Farrow, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 710) for the relief of Henry P. Seymour, William A. Frazer, Alvan N. Sabin, and the heirs of Percy S. Leggett, late supernumerary second lieutenants of the Fifth Michigan Cavalry, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of M. W. Saxton, late first lieutenant Twenty-fourth United States Infantry, praying for his restoration to his rank in the Army, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (S. No. 965) for the relief of D. T. Kirby; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1008) for the relief of William A. Winder, to submit an adverse report thereon, and to recommend the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be printed, and the bill will be postponed indefinitely, if there be no objection.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. BLAIR subsequently said: There was a mistake in regard to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1008 by the Committee on Military Affairs, the committee not hearing me as was designed. I ask that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs for further consideration.

Mr. LOGAN. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to its recommittal in order that the Senator may be heard, if there is no objection on the part of other members of the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill will be recommitted.

Mr. BURNSIDE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 597) for the relief of Rev. Erastus Lathrop, of the State of Illinois, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 698) for the relief of Richard Hawley & Sons, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2649) to authorize the Comptroller of the Currency to issue $500 in new notes to the National Bank at Pontiac, Illinois, to replace a like amount which have never been signed, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1305) abolishing the military reservations of Fort Abercrombie, Fort Seward, and Fort Ransom, all in the Territory of Dakota, and authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to have the lands embraced therein surveyed and made subject to homestead and pre-emption entry and sale, the same as other public lands, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3783) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Jerry Foley, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOOTH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 191) to reduce the price of public lands within railroad limits, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2796) for the relief of George Eyster, reported it without amendment.

COMMITTEE ON EXCISE REVENUE.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to report the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That a joint committee, consisting of two members of the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, be appointed by the respective presiding officers, to take into consideration the alleged losses of revenue arising from the evasion of the stamp-tax on cigars and other articles subject to excise duties, what remedy can be provided by law, and with power to recommend such measures as they may deem proper by bill or otherwise.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of this resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir; it must go over. I am opposed to joint committees. I have no objection to the subject being considered by the Finance Committee or any committee of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution goes over.

POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS.

Mr. BUTLER. I am instructed by the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, who were directed by resolution of the Senate of the 29th of May, 1879, to inquire into the alleged violations of sections 1754 and 1755 of the Revised Statutes, in relation to the appointment of wounded soldiers and sailors to civil offices, and also into alleged violations of civil-service reform in the State of Rhode Island, to submit a report, accompanied by a bill. And I desire to give notice that the minority of the committee propose to present their views. I ask that leave for them. I move that the report be printed.

The bill (S. No. 1366) to prohibit officers and employes of, and claimants against, or corporations created or aided by, the United States, or contractors under the United States, from contributing money for political purposes, was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. TELLER. The minority of the committee retain the right to submit their views.

Mr. BUTLER. I have given notice to that effect.

Mr. TELLER. I did not so understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The views of the minority will be received and printed when presented.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DAWES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1351) granting a pension to Henry Thresher; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FERRY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1352) for the relief of George G. Snyder; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (by request,) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1353) for the relief of N. & G. Taylor Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1354) for the relief of Cyrus K. Lord; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1355) for the relief of First Lieutenant William H. Miller; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HARRIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1356) to provide for the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the town of Fort Smith, on the line of the Indian Territory and the line of the State of Arkansas, to Arkansas City, on the line of said Indian Territory and the line of the State of Kansas, so as to secure to the General Government better postal facilities and a shorter line of travel for the general public; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. BUTLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1357) for the relief of persons whose claims were not presented in time to the court of commissioners of Alabama claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PLUMB asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1359) to authorize and enable the Eastern band of the Cherokee Indians to institute and prosecute a suit in the Court of Claims against the Cherokee Nation; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1360) granting a pension to Aaron Hatcher; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1361) granting an increase of pension to Elisha F. Rogers; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SLATER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1362) creating the customs district of Southern Oregon an inspection district, and providing for the appointment of an inspector of hulls and an inspector of boilers for the same; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VOORHEES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1363) granting a pension to Eli Coopridee; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GROOME (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1364) for the relief of Edwin Mauck, of Crisfield, Maryland; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1365) for the relief of Thomas P. Wollaston; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BUTLER (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 84) to furnish a bronze statue of General Daniel Morgan to the Cowpens centennial committee of Spartanburgh, South Carolina; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CONSTANTINO BRUMIDI.

Mr. VOORHEES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1355) to pay certain moneys to the heirs of Constantino Brumidi, deceased; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask that the bill be read at length for the information of the Senate.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to the heirs of Constantino Brumidi, deceased, the sum of $500, that being the amount reserved from the last voucher paid him for painting in fresco the picture on the canopy of the Dome of the Capitol; and also to pay to said heirs the sum of $200, to defray the funeral expenses of said deceased; said payments to be made out of the moneys appropriated by an act approved March 3, 1879, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes," said appropriation being in the language following: "To pay C. Brumidi for retouching and blending the picture in fresco on the canopy of the Dome of the Capitol and for constructing a scaffolding under said picture, $700."

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, the reason for the introduction of this bill grows out of the following facts: the Government made a contract with Mr. Brumidi for the painting, in fresco, on the canopy of the Dome of the Capitol. The scaffolding necessary to enable the artist to do his work was furnished by the Government. When the painting was finished and the scaffolding removed the Secretary of the Interior withheld the sum of $500 of the contract-price as a guarantee for any retouching which the work might need after it dried out and became thoroughly seasoned to the air. This amount was held back, to be paid to Mr. Brumidi for such future attention on his part as the painting might be found to require. He was at all times in readiness to comply with the wishes of the Government on this subject. No scaffolding, however, was ever replaced on which to work in the canopy of the Dome, nor was he ever called on by the officials having this matter in charge to give his painting there any further attention. After waiting several years, Mr. Brumidi addressed a letter on the subject to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] as chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, asking to be allowed to retouch his work, if necessary, and to draw the balance due him on his contract. This letter was referred by the Senator from Massachusetts to the Architect of the Capitol, who returned the following answer. I will ask the Secretary to read it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ARCHITECT'S OFFICE, UNITED STATES CAPITOL,
Washington, D. C., February 12, 1879.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith the letter of C. Brumidi, relative to his claim for $500, retained from his last payment for painting in fresco the picture on the canopy of the dome.

The statement of Mr. Brumidi in relation to the retention of the $500 is correct. As it is desirable to have the picture finished, I respectfully recommend that an appropriation of $700 be made to pay the balance due him on the picture when finished and for the expense of constructing the necessary scaffolding for the purpose of such completion.

Very respectfully,

EDWARD CLARK,
Architect United States Capitol.

Hon. H. L. DAWES,

Chairman Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, United States Senate.

Mr. VOORHEES. Of course the $500 withheld by the Secretary of the Interior, as above stated, had been covered into the Treasury under the general law as an unexpended balance, and was no longer available. Hence the necessity for a new appropriation. In response to the recommendation of Mr. Clark the Committee on Appropriations, and subsequently both branches of Congress, made the following provision in the sundry civil act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880:

To pay C. Brumidi for retouching and blending the picture in fresco on the canopy of the Dome of the Capitol and for constructing a scaffolding under said picture, $700.

The money thus appropriated has been available nearly a year, yet no steps were taken by the proper authorities to enable Mr. Brumidi to ascend again into the canopy of the Dome of this Capitol, and none now ever will be. In the exact and legal fulfillment of a contract it is our duty to pay this sum of $500 to his heirs. On this point I conceive there can be no difference of opinion. I have ventured, however, in the bill just introduced to ask Congress to apply the remaining $200 of the appropriation of March 3, 1879, to the payment of the funeral expenses of the great artist who has just passed away. May I not be pardoned some brief mention of the wonderful genius, so long, so gently, and so beautifully associated with this Capitol? He died poor, without money enough to bury his worn-out body, but how rich the inheritance he has left to the present and succeeding ages! During more than a quarter of a century he hovered along these walls from the basement to the Dome, leaving creations of imperishable beauty wherever his touch has been. Wherever he paused by a panel, or was seen suspended to a ceiling, there soon appeared the brilliant conceptions of his fertile and cultivated mind. We can form no correct idea of the extent, the variety, and the perfection of his taste and skill as an artist without sometimes forgetting our pressing cares, and looking in detail over his field of labor.

Almost every committee-room announces to the eye by historical or allegorical paintings in fresco the duties to which it is dedicated. Who ever passed through the room of the Committee on Military Affairs without feeling that the very genius of heroism had left there its immortal inspirations? Who would mistake in after ages the use to which the room for the Committee on Naval Affairs had been devoted? The painter has told the whole story in a silent but in an undying language. Who would not know that he approached the room of the Committee on Patents when glancing up he beholds Robert Fulton over the door, with his little steamboat in the distance plying in a small stream as it once did in Rock Creek between this city and Georgetown? As you seek the Committee on Indian Affairs you find Columbus, Las Casas, and the hapless Indian, recalling the whole history of the Indian race. Looking down from the ceiling of the Library Committee room are paintings denoting belles-lettres, painting and history, science and architecture. And so I might continue through the whole range of public affairs, showing that to the unrivaled skill of the painter Mr. Brumidi added the resources of the historian and a full knowledge of the workings of our Government. The poetry of the artist, if I may so express it, had also its field of display. To one who recalls the great forests of the West before they were swept away, the birds and the specimens of American animals with which he has adorned a portion of this Capitol must be a source of unceasing enjoyment. The birds especially are all there, from the humming-bird at an open flower to the bald eagle with his fiery eye and angry feathers. I have been told that the aged artist loved these birds as a father loves his children and that he often lingered in their midst as if a strong tie bound him to them. Doubtless he heard, or seemed to hear, their woodland voices. He loved the beautiful objects and forms of this beautiful world and—

To him who in the love of Nature holds
Communion with her visible forms, she speaks
A various language; for his gayer hours
She has a voice of gladness, and a smile
And eloquence of beauty; and she glides
Into his darker musings with a mild
And healing sympathy, that steals away
Their sharpness ere he is aware.

Mr. Brumidi was engaged at the time of his death on what he regarded as the greatest work of his life. He was unfolding with the magic of genius in the Dome of the Capitol the scroll of American history, from the landing of Columbus to the present day. He earnestly desired to live long enough to complete this vast conception.

But he has left an empty chair, and his great design unfinished, as others have done and will continue to do in other places. At no distant day some memorial will be erected in some appropriate place in this Capitol to his memory. He who beautifies the pathway of life, who creates images of loveliness for the human eye to rest upon, is a benefactor of the human race. He will be crowned by the gratitude of his own and of succeeding generations. In the older countries of Europe, where the profession of art has a higher rank than here, Brumidi would have had a public funeral, and his remains would have been deposited in ground set apart for persons of distinction. In England he would have had a place and a tablet in Westminster Abbey. It matters little, however, whether we or those who come after us do anything to perpetuate his memory. The walls of this Capitol will hold his fame fresh and ever increasing as long as they themselves shall stand.

The painter and the sculptor live in their works and achieve an immortality which belongs to no other class. When you and I, Mr. President, and all who hear me, have passed away and been forgotten; when these active times in which we now strive with each other are looked back to as a remote period of antiquity, and viewed through the mist and haze of perhaps a thousand years; when this Capitol, like the capitol of Rome, may have gone to decay and been covered by the mold and dust of far-reaching centuries, the antiquarian will be found revealing to a wondering world the frescoed beauties of these walls, and with them the name of Constantino Brumidi.

I move that the bill be printed and laid on the table, giving notice that I will call it up to-morrow for the action of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I desire to express my hearty approval of the measure proposed by the Senator from Indiana. It is only justice—and that coldly measured—that we should now pay all we ever promised to one who can make no further demands upon us, but whose works will live to remind us of his twenty-five years of most valuable service in a branch of art where he stood on this continent confessedly foremost, whether among foreign or native artists. Covering as he has done so much space with his fresco paintings—so difficult and so durable—it is wonderful that so great a part should be fairly excellent and so little that competent critics esteem otherwise. If he has not attempted the ambitious rôle of the old masters on the walls and ceilings of churches, it may be at least said that his hand has rarely touched anything which it has not decorated. Even after that accident by which his life hung many minutes fearfully imperiled under the Dome of the Capitol, his latest work there, unfinished though it be, shows that his hand had not lost its cunning, and his acquaintance with American history and skill in its portrayal has, perhaps, never been more happily displayed.

Those who have, without any special intimacy, barely seen this poor and quiet old man as he slowly passed and repassed to his daily tasks, or who have but for a moment listened to his speech in broken English, and never heard his glib tongue when he met those with whom he could converse in his native language, will hardly comprehend his merits as a severe student in the art to which he had devoted his whole life, or his sensitiveness to the harmony and proper blending of colors; still less will they be inclined to credit the rapid and correct drawing of which he was undoubtedly a master; but the evidences of his rare genius and of swift work are too conspicuous to be denied. We have only to look around to behold them all.

Brumidi was a diligent reader of Dante, of Gibbon, of Bancroft, and many other works from which he derived historical and classical aid, and his great desire was that he might live to complete his last great work. So long had he devoted his heart and strength to this Capitol that his love and reverence for it was not surpassed by even that of Michael Angelo for St. Peter's.

He leaves a daughter in Italy dependent upon a regular remittance from her father, and he leaves an adopted son beginning to be taught in the line of his father's vocation, but not so far advanced as to give any support.

I hope it will be the pleasure of the Senate unanimously to pass the bill whenever it comes up for action.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie upon the table and be printed.

BATTLE OF GETTYSBURGH.

Mr. GORDON. In connection with the papers that I presented this morning I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the letter of the Secretary of War of March 12 and the resolutions of the Society of the Army of the Potomac of December 3, 1878, regarding the preservation of the data concerning the battle of Gettysburg, and all the papers relating thereto, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; also, that the memorials upon that subject be referred to the same committee.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

LIKENESS OF THE LATE JOSEPH HENRY.

Mr. GARLAND submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of securing an accurate likeness of Professor Joseph Henry, late Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, for the purpose of placing the same in the institution.

REPORT OF ENTOMOLOGICAL COMMISSION.

Mr. LOGAN submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That there be printed, with necessary illustrations, at the Government Printing Office, 6,000 extra copies of Bulletin No. 5 of the United States Entomological Commission, on the subject of the chinch-bug; 3,000 copies for the use of the House, 2,000 for the use of the Senate, and 1,000 copies for the use of the Department of the Interior.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. On the 2d of April a bill (S. No. 327) for the improvement of the Harlem River was introduced by me at the request of parties interested. The same parties now desire to offer an amendment to the bill. I present the amendment, and move that the bill with the amendment be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. THEODORE F. KING, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 4606) authorizing the President of the United States to nominate Drs. Thomas Owens and William Martin assistant surgeons in the United States Navy;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 110) authorizing Lieutenant B. H. Buckingham, of the United States Navy, to accept a decoration conferred upon him by the President of the French Republic;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 112) authorizing First Lieutenant Henry Metcalfe, of the Ordnance Department, United States Army, to accept a decoration from the Sultan of Turkey;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 208) authorizing General Francis A. Walker, Superintendent of the Census, to accept decorations from the governments of Sweden and Spain; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 219) in relation to the claim of John C. Landreau against the government of Peru.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. No. 2003) for the relief of J. P. Zimmerman and H. P. Snow, of Clinton County, Kentucky;

A bill (H. R. No. 2785) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint a deputy collector at Lake Charles, Louisiana; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 80) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to transport contributions for the relief of the suffering poor of Ireland.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE LAY.

The message also communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. A. M. LAY, late a member of the House from the State of Missouri, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the call of the Calendar.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 527) to provide that all persons sentenced to imprisonment by the United States courts shall be confined in the prisons of the States wherein they were tried and convicted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This bill was reported adversely from the Committee on the Judiciary, and it will be passed over.

NATIONAL CAPITOL INSURANCE COMPANY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 360) repealing the charter of the National Capitol Insurance Company.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear some explanation of that bill.

Mr. PLATT. Let the report be read.

Mr. HARRIS. If it is desired that an explanation shall be fully and satisfactorily made, I prefer that the bill go over in the absence of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] who reported it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

ABSALOM KIRBY.

The next business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (S. R. No. 68) for the relief of Passed Assistant Engineer Absalom Kirby, of the Navy.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

INSPECTOR OF PLUMBING.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1894) authorizing the employment of an inspector of plumbing in and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROLLINS. I think that bill had better go over. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] is not here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There are several other reasons why it should go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

OMAHA INDIAN RESERVATION.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1136) to provide for the sale of a portion of the reservation of the Omaha tribe of Indians.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let that go over, Mr. President.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I hope no Senator will object to this bill. It is reported unanimously by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and it is just in the form of a bill that passed several years ago, but failed to be carried out at the time for some reason, as the committee understand, and now there is no objection to this on the part of the Indians or the whites, but there is anxiety on the part of both that it may be passed. There is no objection anywhere, and I hope it may be allowed to go through.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it will require more time than we can give it under the Anthony rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1139) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, late major-general of the United States volunteers and colonel of the Army.

Mr. TELLER. That had better go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

ALBERT V. CONWAY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 768) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds to Albert V. Conway, substituted trustee, for certain registered United States bonds redeemed or assigned by the Government upon forged assignments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report, Mr. President, if there is one.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is no report.

Mr. ALLISON. There is a House report. The facts are very brief in this case. Mary A. Boyd was a joint trustee, as I remember the facts, and in some way secured possession of these bonds and by means of a forged assignment they were paid to wrong parties.

Mr. COCKRELL. She was one of two trustees?

Mr. ALLISON. She was one of two trustees. These bonds were written to certain minor heirs. The heirs can get no relief at the Treasury. The matter was considered by the Committee on Finance, and they unanimously authorized me to report the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Iowa answer the question whether this trustee was not as rightfully in possession of these bonds as any one could be? Was it not simply a breach of trust on the part of the trustee, and must the Government be made responsible for a breach of trust on the part of this trustee? Must not the injured parties seek their recourse against the trustee?

Mr. ALLISON. The matter has passed somewhat from my mind, but I think all the papers were returned with the bill. There is a report from the House committee connected with the bill. It may be that Mary A. Boyd was not strictly a trustee.

Mr. COCKRELL. That would make a very material difference. If she was trustee, and had possession of the bonds, she had that possession legally, and there was only a breach of trust on her part, for which the Government is not responsible.

Mr. ALLISON. She in some way secured possession of the bonds, and by means of a forged assignment they were paid. The proper trustee appointed by the court now applies for the bonds for the benefit of those rightfully entitled to them. But the facts are not fresh in my memory; and at the suggestion of some Senators I will let the case go over for the present. I am willing that the case shall be passed over until the papers come in.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The case will be passed without prejudice, and the next case reported.

REMISSION OF DUTY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3058) authorizing the remission or refunding of duty on an altar from Rome, Italy, for the Saint John's cathedral of Indianapolis, Indiana; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HORTENSIA H. COOK.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 66) for the relief of Hortensia H. Cook.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report read, in that case.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. PRYOR on the 29th of January:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 66) for the relief of Hortensia H. Cook, administratrix of Henry Cook, deceased, having had under consideration the same, and accompanying documents, report:

That from the letters, two in number, from Green B. Raum, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Treasury Department, bearing date January 2, 1878, and January 2, 1879, furnishing information upon inquiries touching this claim, from the records of the United States direct-tax commissioner for Virginia, on file in Office of Internal Revenue, Treasury Department—

1. That a certain lot of ground on King street, in the city and county of Alexandria, Virginia, (more particularly described in documents herewith filed,) said to belong to A. C. Briggs, and charged to him on the land books of the State aforesaid for the year 1860, was sold for the non-payment of direct taxes, on the 1st of February, 1864, to Henry Cook, for the sum of $400, the amount of tax, penalty, interest, and cost of sale being $7.05.

2. That the records of the office of United States direct tax commissioner for Virginia aforesaid, on file as aforesaid, do not show that the money has ever been paid back.

3. That Hortensia H. Cook, represented as the widow of the purchaser at tax sale, applied to Green B. Raum, Commissioner as aforesaid, for the return of the purchase-money aforesaid, under the provisions of the acts of Congress of the 9th of May and 8th of June, 1872.

4. That the Commissioner, Green B. Raum, aforesaid, refused the application to pay back said purchase-money so paid by Cook as aforesaid, upon the grounds that the acts of 1872, above mentioned, only provide for the refunding or paying back of the purchase-money when the purchaser has been evicted by a judgment of a United States court; and also rejected said application, and refused to refund said purchase-money, upon the further ground that it appeared that Cook had received a deed of conveyance of said lot from said Briggs.

5. That in this case it does not appear that Cook was ejected or evicted from said lot of ground by a judgment of a court or otherwise.

6. That after the direct-tax sale the said Cook did receive from the said Briggs a conveyance of title to said lot.

7. That the deed of conveyance from Briggs, the alleged owner, to Cook, the purchaser at the tax sale, recites a consideration of $800, and excepts from the operation of the covenants as to warranty of title the forfeiture and sale of the lot conveyed for the non-payment of the United States direct tax.

8. That in the case of the claim and act of Congress for the relief of Anthony Lawson, surviving partner of the firm of Lawson & Brewis, of Alexandria—July 19, 1876—the commissioner of the internal revenue for the direct tax in Virginia adopted a rule not to receive the tax due on property so advertised unless tendered by the owner in person; that the Supreme Court, in the case of Lacy vs. Irwin, (18 Wallace,) held that this rule was unauthorized, and rendered a sale under it void.

The committee, after considering the facts thus obtained from the accompanying documents, which are here referred to and made a part hereof, (papers are on file in Secretary's office to which reference is made) have reached the conclusion that the sale, under the rules of the commissioners in Virginia, was void, and that in that event Cook had the right to voluntarily do that which a court of competent jurisdiction would have decreed or adjudged he could or might do by way of perfecting his title to said lot sold at said tax sale; and that therefore he did not prejudice his right to have the purchase-money paid back by purchasing the lot from Briggs and receiving a deed of conveyance therefor from him. But it is probable that Henry Cook, having obtained and received the deed of and for said lot, could not successfully maintain a suit where he would be both the plaintiff and defendant, and such would be the case if he, under the acts of 1872, should be required to secure a judgment of eviction, as insisted upon by the Commissioner, Green B. Raum, before the purchase-money could be refunded to him under the acts of 1872; and equally so as to his administratrix. These difficulties should not, in the estimation of this committee, prejudice the claimant. That it is the sense of this committee that justice requires that the claimant should be refunded the amount claimed in the bill, and the committee therefore report back the bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is one of a large class of applications that have been before Congress for a long time.

Mr. PRYOR. I ask the Senator from Vermont, if he has any opposition to the bill, to let it pass over until the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS,] who has manifested an interest in the welfare of the bill, can have an opportunity to hear what may be said. I ask that it be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know that I shall be willing to pass it without prejudice unless it is to happen that I shall be in the Senate Chamber when without prejudice it shall suddenly come up some time.

Mr. PRYOR. I will suggest to the Senator from Virginia, if the Senator from Vermont is not in his seat that he give him an opportunity to be present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With that understanding I have no objection, but I wish to say just here that I am opposed to the passage of the bill. I think Congress deliberately laid down the most liberal rule in the general law that it has provided, which could be adopted in such a case, because we all know that upon principles of law and administration we are under no obligation to purchasers at tax sales. They buy whatever they can get, and usually buy as a speculation to take their chances. I think that one committee of this body has, at this present session, on not a tax sale, but a confiscation sale, held to that rule and refused to give relief. Therefore, I am opposed to this species of legislation. This is only one of a pretty large class.

In the next place I do not think the committee has found that the circumstances of this case fall within any explicit decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. I know the decision to which reference has been made in the report; but I should want a very careful examination of the facts to be sure that every fact brought the case within that decision. So I am opposed to the whole bill as it stands, upon the principle of the thing; but certainly in the absence of the Senator from Virginia I should not wish to have it taken up for consideration now. Therefore I assent to its going over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will stand first on the next call of the Calendar. The morning hour has expired. Before calling up the unfinished business, the Chair will submit some bills from the House of Representatives for the purpose of reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4606) authorizing the President of the United States to nominate Drs. Thomas Owens and William Martin assistant surgeons in the United States Navy was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The following joint resolutions were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 208) authorizing General Francis A. Walker, Superintendent of the Census, to accept decorations from the governments of Sweden and Spain;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 110) authorizing Lieutenant B. H. Buckingham, of the United States Navy, to accept a decoration conferred upon him by the President of the French Republic;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 112) authorizing First Lieutenant Henry Metcalfe, of the Ordnance Department, United States Army, to accept a decoration from the Sultan of Turkey; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 219) in relation to the claim of John C. Landreau against the government of Peru.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE LAY.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask now that the resolutions of the House of Representatives in regard to the death of Hon. ALFRED M. LAY be taken from the Secretary's desk and presented to the Senate for suitable action.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolutions from the House of Representatives; which were read:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 23, 1880.

Resolved, That this House has heard with profound regret of the death of Hon. ALFRED M. LAY, late a member of this House from the State of Missouri.

Resolved, That as a testimonial of respect to his memory the officers and members of this body will wear the usual badge of mourning for the space of thirty days.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the Clerk of this House to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to communicate a copy of these proceedings to the Senate, and that, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the House do now adjourn.

Attest:

GEO. M. ADAMS, Clerk,
By GREEN ADAMS, Chief Clerk.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I offer a resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. ALFRED MORRISON LAY, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, ALFRED MORRISON LAY was born May 20, 1836, in Lewis County, Missouri, and in 1842 removed with his parents to Benton County. He received his early education in private schools, and then entered Bethany College, Virginia, from which he graduated in 1856. He then entered upon the study of law in Jefferson City, Missouri, and was there admitted to the bar in 1857. He was soon afterward appointed by President Buchanan United States attorney for the western district of Missouri.

He resigned this office in 1861, and soon thereafter enlisted as a private soldier in the division of General John B. Clark, a part of the military organization in Missouri known as the Missouri State Guard, and rose to the rank of major. He was subsequently captured by the Federal forces and held as a prisoner of war until some time in 1862, when he was duly exchanged and entered the confederate army, in which he served to the close of the war.

He then returned to his home in Jefferson City, and formed a partnership in the practice of law with Hon. J. Ed. Belch, the speaker of the last house of representatives of Missouri. In 1875 he was elected in his senatorial district a member of the constitutional convention convened in that year. On July 25, 1878, he received the nomination for Congress in the seventh district from the democratic congressional convention convened at Boonville, and immediately began an active canvass.

On October 19, while speaking at Otterville he was suddenly stricken with paralysis, and for weeks remained in a very critical condition. He was elected by a decided majority a member of the Forty-sixth Congress and, though very feeble, attended the opening of the first or called session of the Forty-sixth Congress in March, 1879, but was soon compelled to return home. He was again punctually at the post of duty at the beginning of the present session in December last, with seemingly a fair hope of recovery.

On Sunday, December 7, in company with his devoted Christian wife, he attended church in this city, and about nine o'clock in the evening expressed himself to friends as very hopeful and of feeling unusually well. Soon after retiring he was again stricken with the fatal disease which terminated his earthly existence about ten o'clock on the morning of December 8. His remains were escorted by committees of the House and Senate to his home in Jefferson City, and there interred in the cemetery, attended by relatives, neighbors, and friends, deeply mourning his death and condoling with his bereft wife and children.

An honored Representative of the good people of the seventh congressional district of Missouri in the Congress of the United States, at his post of duty and honor, has been taken by death from us, his colleagues and associates. In expressing our regard for the deceased and paying a fitting tribute to his memory, according to our custom, I shall not indulge in mere fulsome declamation and unmerited praise. I personally knew Major LAY from 1862 to his death, and was often thrown in business and social relations with him. We were personal friends. I knew him in all the relations of life. As has been said of another, so I can truthfully say of him:

So his life has flow'd
From its mysterious urn a sacred stream,
In whose calm depth the beautiful and pure
Alone are mirror'd; which, though shapes of ill
May hover round its surface, glides in light,
And takes no shadow from them.

Mr. LAY was the true gentleman. He was courteous in his bearing, gentle and kind in his disposition, conscientious in his convictions, and firm in his principles. As a friend he was candid, sincere, generous, and warm-hearted. As an opponent he was just, fair, and honorable. He never sought his own promotion by defaming those opposed to him, personally or politically. In 1874 he was a candidate for the nomination for Congress and was defeated. In 1876 he was again a candidate and defeated. In 1878 he was successful, after a heated contest. In all these contests he enjoyed the regard and friendship of his competitors, and never lost the confidence of his constituents. He relied for success upon his own character and merits. In the profession of law he was regarded an able lawyer, an effective advocate, and a safe counselor. As a father he was gentle and affectionate. As a husband he was tender, devoted, and faithful. In the discharge of all duties he was diligent, laborious, and conscientious. As a citizen and an officer, a servant of the people, he was faithful, honest, incorruptible. In the convention which gave the present constitution to Missouri he was a useful and an honored member. On account of his physical condition and short term of service in Congress, no opportunity was afforded for the development of that career of usefulness to his country and honor to himself so confidently anticipated by his friends and constituents.

Prior to his paralysis Mr. LAY had a robust physical constitution capable of great endurance and labor.

When he received the nomination for Congress in 1878 his election was assured; he was in his forty-third year, in the prime and vigor of manhood, and enjoyed the respect and confidence of the people of his district and State. His life was full of promise. While delivering a speech to his constituents—suddenly, without a moment's warning, he was stricken down by that fatal disease which terminated in his death. Truly

Death rides on every passing breeze,
He lurks in every flower.

We have divine authority for saying, "No man dieth to himself." Equally true is it, Mr. President, that "none of us liveth to himself." The life of our departed friend and colleague was one of the many millions cast upon the bosom of Time on earth as the pebble is cast upon the bosom of the ocean, which has caused waves of influence to rise and spread which will continue until they strike the farthest shores of eternity.

He has left to his widow, children, and countrymen a priceless legacy—a spotless character.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President, I was not personally acquainted with the deceased Representative from Missouri, but having been a member of the committee appointed to escort his remains to his late residence in that State, and to attend his funeral there, I have thought it not inappropriate to take some part in the proceedings now being had here in honor of his memory.

The Senator from Missouri who has just spoken has spoken fully of Mr. LAY's record as a public man and of his standing as a citizen. My purpose is to speak very briefly, and from very limited means of knowledge, of what I learned of him from his neighbors and friends during my short stay among them while attending his funeral. There is, perhaps, no better means of judging of a man's real worth than by hearing what may be said of him after his death by those among whom he lived and moved in the daily and familiar intercourse of every-day life. Judging Mr. LAY in this way, and by this test, he was a good and true man. During my short stay in Jefferson City his name was necessarily on the lips of all who knew him, and from all who spoke of him in my hearing I heard only high praise of his character while living and deep regret for his loss. So far as I heard, all classes of his fellow-townsmen, the high and the lowly, the rich and the poor, the good and those not so good, spoke well of him as an honest, truthful, and brave man; as a kindly, genial, and generous man; as a good and helpful neighbor, and as a true and trusty friend.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, to simply state that I knew ALFRED M. LAY well, would be gross injustice to the intimate friendship which existed between us for more than the quarter of a century. I knew him so thoroughly and loved him so much, for no shadow ever came between us, that in paying this tribute to his memory I shall avoid all mere decoration of words, and in the plain phrase of simple truth speak of him who Loved and lived the truth so well.

ALFRED MORRISON LAY was born in Lewis County, Missouri, on the 20th day of May, 1836. In 1856 he graduated at Bethany College, Virginia, and commenced the study of law in the office of General James B. Gardenhin, then attorney-general of Missouri. Upon his admission to practice in 1857 he became General Gardenhin's partner, and in less than two years was appointed United States attorney for the western district of Missouri. This position he held until August, 1861, when a sense of duty, distinct and emphatic, caused him to resign and enter the Missouri State Guard, where he served with the rank of major. In the winter of 1861-'62 he was taken prisoner, but was exchanged in the fall of 1862, and remained in the confederate service until the close of the war, being paroled at Vicksburgh in 1865.

Returning to Jefferson City, he resumed the practice of his profession, and in 1874 became a candidate for Congress in a contest certainly the most remarkable in the political history of Missouri, if not in that of the Union. For more than a week the nominating convention balloted between three candidates, Mr. LAY, Hon. T. T. Crittenden, and Hon. JOHN F. PHILIPS, and for six hundred and ninety-one ballots Mr. LAY received the largest number of votes. Believing it his duty in the interest of his party and district to terminate the struggle, fast degenerating into a bitter personal contest, Mr. LAY then withdrew, and Colonel PHILIPS was nominated and elected.

In 1875 Mr. LAY was chosen, without opposition, a member of the constitutional convention of Missouri and assisted in framing the State constitution now in force.

In 1876 he was again a candidate for Congress; but Colonel Crittenden received the nomination. And in 1878 the long and protracted struggle in the district terminated by the nomination of Mr. LAY over Colonel Crittenden.

Mr. President, in all political and even personal history I do not know a sadder page than that upon which is written the termination of the ensuing canvass and of a life's ambition. As the deceased had often told me, it was the dream of his boyhood to represent his native State in the National Congress. At last, after years of struggle, the hour came when his hand reached to the prize, and even in that moment he was stricken down.

At one of his last appointments, and while addressing an audience, Mr. LAY was attacked by paralysis and fell almost insensible. Conveyed to his home, he partially recovered, but was an inactive spectator of the remainder of the canvass, which terminated in his election by a large majority.

Actuated by an earnest sense of duty and against medical advice, he attended the commencement of the extra session, but after a few days returned to the Hot Springs of Arkansas, to which he had repaired some weeks before. His health improving, he determined to attend this session, and we traveled together from Saint Louis. On that journey he talked to me often and earnestly of his condition and of his full preparation for any change. Although anxious for recovery, he well knew the insidious foe whose grasp had been relaxed but not released, and he awaited the result, as he had every event of life, fearlessly and calmly. On the 7th day of December, 1879, it came. After retiring at the National Hotel, in this city, he was again attacked by paralysis, and died at half past ten o'clock the next day.

No life is perfect, but each has its aggregate of good or evil; and, aside from empty panegyric, this at last must be the question as each of us drifts out upon the shoreless ocean: "Was his life for good or evil; were its duties performed?"

Mr. President, standing in this high presence, I, who knew the dead intimately in peace and war, in sunshine and shadow, as citizen, soldier, husband, father, and friend, bear testimony before all the world that everywhere and at all times he was modest, firm, intelligent, earnest, and true.

As a lawyer Mr. LAY was singularly faithful, his skill and judgment unquestionable. Consistent and conscientious, as a citizen and in his private relations he was without reproach. Other lives may have been more eventful, but never one of which it could be more truthfully said, "It was devoted to duty."

Of my friend I have spoken as I knew him, and it only remains for me now, in the name of the State of Missouri, to place this offering on his grave.

I move the adoption of the resolution offered by my colleague.

The resolution was agreed to unanimously.

Mr. VEST. As a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at one o'clock and fifty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 24, 1880.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ADMISSIONS TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. O'NEILL. I ask unanimous consent that the privilege of the floor be granted to a delegation consisting of members of the city councils of Philadelphia, of the Commercial Maritime and Trade Boards of Philadelphia, the representatives of the press, and many distinguished citizens from every business pursuit.

There being no objection, the request was granted.

Mr. PHISTER. I make a similar request on behalf of Professor Joseph D. Pickett, superintendent of public instruction of Kentucky.

There being no objection, the request was granted.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I ask that the same privilege be extended to a committee from the city of Chicago who have visited Washington for the purpose of securing the selection of Chicago for the meeting of the democratic national convention.

There being no objection, the request was granted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks the privilege of admission to the floor for Hon. S. S. Warner, at the request of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MONROE;] for Hon. J. H. Willard, member of the Indiana Legislature, at the request of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOSTETTER;] for Judge Joseph H. Sherrard, of Virginia, at the request of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON;] and for Thomas H. Denny and John F. Saulsbury, of Delaware, at the request of the gentleman from Delaware, [Mr. MARTIN.]

Mr. BREWER. Had we not better suspend the rule?

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent. Does the gentleman object to these requests?

Mr. BREWER. I do not make any objection.

There being no objection, the requests were granted.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I make a similar request in behalf of Hon. John

E. Devlin, formerly a member of the Legislature of the State of New York, who is now in this city.

There being no objection, the request was granted.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. CHALMERS, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD remarks on the education of colored youth. [See Appendix.]

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. COX took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the paper I send to the Clerk's desk be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, February 11.

Congressman REAGAN, chairman of the House Committee on Commerce, has involved himself in trouble with his bill to regulate interstate commerce. Yesterday the committee, eight to seven, decided not to report the bill to the House. REAGAN was greatly incensed at the action of the committee, and in his anger he insinuated that improper influences had been used to defeat his bill. The gentleman who had opposed his measure rebuked him in unmeasured terms for his insinuation and he withdrew the remarks. Subsequently he begged to be allowed to report his bill to the House, and in order to obtain a vote on this motion Congressman BLISS, who had opposed the bill, obligingly entered a motion to reconsider. The question will be settled at the meeting of the committee on Friday. Last evening, when interviewed by a reporter, Mr. REAGAN expressed himself very boldly about the matter. When asked what caused the defeat of the bill, he said: "Interest; the railroads vigorously opposed it. The committee was originally stocked to defeat it."

"If it again falls in the committee what will you do?"

"I don't propose to reveal my line of action, but I will find a man to bring the bill before the House, which is, I am convinced, strongly in favor of it."

This morning Speaker RANDALL demanded of Mr. REAGAN a retraction of his assertion that the committee had been prepared originally to defeat the bill. Mr. REAGAN said that the reporter had misunderstood him, and that he had not intended to insinuate anything against the Speaker. He promised to have his language corrected in the newspaper to-morrow. If this is done, no notice will be taken of the interview in the House. The members of the committee, however, are deliberating whether or not to pass a resolution censuring Mr. REAGAN for his language. An apology from Mr. REAGAN will probably end the matter. Should he be censured by his committee, he would undoubtedly resign his chairmanship.

Mr. REAGAN. This statement seems to have been made in the New York Sun newspaper of the 11th of this month. But I did not see it or know of its existence till I saw it in the Houston (Texas) Telegram newspaper on last Saturday. It is so gross a perversion of the truth in relation to matters connected with my duties here, and was so manifestly designed to bring odium on me and my conduct as a Representative, that, unpleasant as the duty is, I feel constrained to correct it on this floor, and in the presence of those who are represented as actors in the matter.

Of the false statements it contains I only propose to call attention to three:

First, it is not true that the gentlemen of the committee who had opposed my bill rebuked me in unmeasured terms, or that they rebuked me at all.

Second, it is not true that Mr. Speaker RANDALL demanded of me a retraction of any assertion that I had made, or that I promised to have my language corrected in the newspapers. Mr. RANDALL did call my attention to what purported to be an interview in the Post newspaper of that morning, and stated that it was calculated to do him injustice. On reading it, I told him the statement as made was not mine and that I was not responsible for it; that I had refused to be interviewed, but had some conversation with the reporter, and that he had only reported a part of what I had said, and I would request the Post to correct its statement, not mine. And this correction was made.

Third, I am informed by the members of the committee that it is not true that they deliberated whether they should censure me for my language or for any other cause.

I have intentionally avoided any reference to anything which occurred in the committee beyond negating the false statements referred to. On inquiry I am informed that similar dispatches were sent to other cities and papers. I suppose, without knowing the fact, that the object of this false and slanderous statement being sent to the country was that it should follow the action of the committee in refusing to report my bill, with an effort to bring odium on me as one of the means of defeating a great measure with which my name has been somewhat connected, which is designed to benefit the whole American people.

I have only to add that I do not expect to escape false and infamous attacks on both my conduct and character while engaged in a struggle in the interest of the people against the combined influence of the great corporations of the country and their billions of capital; but I shall continue the contest faithfully to the end.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Mr. Speaker, on the morning of the publication to which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has alluded, my attention was called to the article in question. I naturally was indignant; and as soon as I could see and confer with the gentleman from Texas I did so, calling his attention to the statement, which he said was not his own, adding that he would see that the proper correction was made. That correction was made. There my connection with the matter ended. There was neither menace nor necessity for menace on my part. I never should have alluded to the matter on the floor of this House if the gentleman from Texas had not introduced it; for it is not my habit to bring into the House what occurs outside.

As I said to the gentleman from Texas at the time, the statement was a serious and wicked one, for which, I want to say here in the presence of the House, there is not a scintilla of foundation in truth from beginning to end. So far from being swayed in the least degree in the appointment of the committee by such considerations as those suggested, I never thought when this committee was appointed of what legislation was likely to come before it. The committee was appointed with reference to all the great interests of the country. In conclusion, I repeat that any such statement as that which has been read is wickedly and outrageously untrue in so far as it undertakes to attribute to me any undue motives in the appointment of that committee or any other.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I will only add that it seems to me there was no occasion for the Speaker of the House to characterize the language used in that purported interview with reference to anything I have said, because in my language to him, and to the very man who made the statement, the Speaker of this House was exonerated.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) My remarks as to the wickedness and wrong of the charges were confined to the article as printed.

Mr. WAIT. Mr. Speaker, I only wish to say, in justification of the chairman of the committee, that there was not, to my recollection, any movement on the part of any member of the committee looking to the passing of a vote censuring the action of the chairman. I cannot be mistaken with regard to this, for I have a very distinct recollection of the discussion that sprung up in the committee on the occasion referred to by the gentleman from Texas and the Speaker of the House; and so far as regards the statement in the public prints, that the chairman of the committee intimated that the Speaker had "packed" the committee so as to secure the defeat of any particular measure, I understood the chairman to deny most emphatically that he for one moment meant to convey any such intimation in the language which he then used. The members of the committee repudiated the idea that the Speaker had packed the committee, and, so far as they severally expressed their opinions, declared in terms that there was not any foundation for such belief. Had the committee been improperly or unfairly constituted by the Speaker, it would inevitably have been suspected by some member or members, but they one and all declared at this time that they had not the faintest belief that any such course was pursued by the Speaker. I say this in justice to that gentleman, should any one infer that there was any cause for such belief from the tendency of the present discussion.

The members of the committee of course differed in their views as to the expediency of passing this particular bill, then pending before them. The chairman had his views, and a majority of us entertained views differing from him; but there was not any such action pursued by the chairman or by the committee as is claimed in the article which the gentleman from Texas has had read to the House. The article, according to my best recollection, is not correct in the important particulars to which I have referred.

Mr. McLANE. If the gentleman from Connecticut had covered the question I should not have trespassed upon the House. Permit me to say, Mr. Speaker, that he has only made reference to one, and a very immaterial branch of the question. The committee in their deliberation had occasion to deal with this question, and the chairman, in using language substantially the same as that to which he has referred, certainly did disclaim any intention to reflect either on the Speaker or upon any member of that committee. That disclaimer was accepted, because it relieved every member of that committee, as well as the Speaker, from any reproach. It left the honorable chairman of that committee his entire responsibility for the sense in which he used those terms. He was able to use those terms without feeling he reflected either upon the Speaker or upon any colleague, although he might have a colleague who could not perceive how he could use such language without reflecting both upon the Speaker and his colleagues. But when his attention was called to the fact that the Speaker as well as his colleagues so construed his language his disclaimer was as satisfactory to his colleagues as it was to the Speaker, so far as the personality thereof was in question.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Maryland makes a statement which does not give a fair impression of what occurred. He does not state as fully as he might have stated, if he remembered what occurred, that I said the committee was so constituted as to defeat the reporting of that bill. How any member of the committee came to conclude he was reflected upon by such a statement, those who did feel so can determine for themselves. I was not aware any member of the committee was responsible for his own appointment or the appointment of any one else.

The statement which I made was that my impression was that the Speaker had been induced by influences outside of his knowledge to appoint a committee which would defeat this measure. The main reason I had for saying so was that it was a known fact this bill had received a majority of thirty-five in the last House of Representatives, and the impression was clear it was much stronger in the present than in the last House of Representatives, and that its passage was demanded by a very general expression from all parts of the country. It also caused me anxiety when I felt a measure which had received the support of the last House and was so strongly supported in the present House should not be allowed to be reported; and I may have been betrayed by my feelings into using pretty strong language, for

I do not claim any saintly qualities. I did feel earnestly, as I have felt earnestly on this question, especially in view of the fact that the reporting of the bill to this House was so long delayed against what seemed to me the manifest will of the country and of the House.

What I desire to say in reply to what the gentleman from Maryland has said, is this: he ought, in making his statement, to have said that when it was suggested by a member of the committee my language might be offensive to the Speaker, I then made the statement I now make, that no man was authorized to assume any such thing, because the Speaker always professed to be a friend of this measure; and I could only suppose if the committee was constituted on wrong principles he may have been induced to so constitute the committee by influences unknown to himself.

Mr. McLANE. Mr. Speaker, not only was it far from my intention not to state fully all of the facts necessary to a fair understanding of this issue, but I did state all the material facts which were in the case. But inasmuch as the honorable gentleman from Texas has chosen to make this quasi appeal to the sense of the House, I feel we are here related to each other precisely as we were in the Committee on Commerce, and that as every member of the Committee on Commerce had an opportunity to have his opinion as to the remarks of the gentleman from Texas, so now by his action must every member of this House have his judgment.

And I submit, Mr. Speaker, that when an honorable gentleman of this House undertakes to say that a committee, of which he is a member, has been so constituted or so "stocked" by the Speaker as to defeat or not report any particular measure—

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman ought not to say "by the Speaker," as if that were my language, for I never did utter any such language.

Mr. McLANE. Well, Mr. Speaker, the identical words "by the Speaker" may or may not have been used. I will cheerfully accept the disclaimer of the gentleman from Texas, and suppose that they were not used; but not being used, what is the sense of it when an honorable gentleman says that a committee has been constituted or stocked to defeat a particular bill? Who constitutes the committee? Who stocks the committee but the Speaker? What a play upon terms it is to say the particular words "by the Speaker" were not used!

Now, I submit, Mr. Speaker, no matter what was the feeling, (and I have no doubt at all it has been correctly stated by the gentleman from Texas,) he being somewhat excited, somewhat disturbed, somewhat despondent—I desire to use the term most agreeable to him—being somewhat moved by the unexpected defeat of this bill in the committee, he made an observation that the committee had been constituted or stocked—that was the word used—to defeat that bill. Mr. Speaker, it was not necessary in the language of that reporter to denounce the chairman or to take him to task or to arraign him, but it was perfectly in the line of intercourse which gentlemen ought always to maintain, not only in committee but elsewhere, to call his attention to the fact that such an expression was a reflection upon the honor of the Speaker who had constituted the committees, and being a reflection upon the Speaker, it was necessarily a reflection upon the individual members constituting the committee. No gentleman on the committee even supposed that improper motives were attributed to him or his action, but no proper intercourse can be maintained among gentlemen on a committee or in this House when the feeling of any gentleman prompts him, if he has been voted down in the language of the reporter, or who thinks himself in a minority, to indulge in any insinuation that a majority or a minority has been improperly influenced. It is not necessary.

Mr. REAGAN. No such word was used by me, nor did I make any such insinuation in the committee or anywhere else.

Mr. McLANE. So be it, Mr. Speaker, and yet if the language was susceptible to such a construction, and I submit that it was, as now stated by the honorable gentleman it was the manifest duty of the colleagues of the honorable gentleman to call his attention to it—not to be offended, not to take to themselves any improper insinuation, but simply to inform him that the language was not agreeable, that the language would not be accepted among gentlemen, and that it was to be supposed that whether in committee or in this House we were all under an obligation, to maintain that intercourse with each other as gentlemen, not only not to use language which could be misunderstood but to take particular pains not to use language which could be misunderstood.

Now, there is no occasion for me to pursue this subject further, were it not that, being entered upon, I think it ought to be exhausted, and I treat this House precisely as I treated the committee. Not only was such language as that which the honorable gentleman from Texas admitted that he used, not only was that in my judgment indefensible and improper, no matter whether it was incorrect or not, but it is not language which gentlemen on the floor of this House, or in any committee of this House ought to use in their deliberations with each other.

But I desire to call the attention of the House as well as the attention of the gentleman from Texas to the further fact, which I consider a very material fact, in view of the allegation that has been made, whether it was intended to be made offensively or not, to wit: that the Committee on Commerce when they deliberated on this bill were perfectly willing that the honorable chairman of the committee should report it to this House. No objection was taken.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. Cox.) The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I desire to know whether in this connection it is proper to go into the discussion of that measure?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state in reply to the gentleman that he thinks it improper to go into the discussion of any bill on a question of privilege, but there is scarcely any limit to a debate of this kind according to the usages of the House.

Mr. McLANE. The question before the House is a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I do not desire it shall proceed by unanimous consent. I am perfectly willing that any explanation affecting any member of this House shall be made in full; but I do insist that there shall be no discussion now of the merits of the measure out of which this explanation springs.

Mr. McLANE. There will not be any.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland will proceed in order.

Mr. McLANE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to add to what I have said a word in reference to the statement which the honorable gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has submitted to the House to-day, that he made the remark he did that he considered the Committee on Commerce had been constituted adversely to the bill without in that remark intending any offense to the Speaker or any offense to his colleagues.

Now, sir, I desire to recall the gentleman's attention and the attention of the House to this fact: That when that committee entered upon its deliberations upon that bill and heard all that the chairman had to say upon the subject, and all that anybody opposed to the bill had to say on the subject, they were perfectly willing to have the bill reported to the House. There was no opposition to the reporting of the bill. There was no opposition to the chairman reporting it in his own time and place, every member of the committee reserving to himself the right to urge whatever objection he might have to make to the bill. By a unanimous vote it was agreed the bill should be so reported. By a unanimous vote of the committee it was agreed that the bill should come before the House, each gentleman reserving any opposition he might have to it or his right to move any amendment he might have to make.

But I desire to call the honorable chairman's attention to a fact which is most material as showing the original views entertained by the committee on that bill. After it was thus ordered to be reported it was recalled at the request of members of the committee who desired to give parties in interest a hearing. These parties in interest occupied three weeks in the discussion of the bill, representing every part of the country; and at the end of the discussion, instead of the committee being willing to report the bill to this House, there were views entertained by members of the committee that were presented in amendments to the bill; and in the course of that discussion a final vote was reached which substituted a bill introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON] for the original bill. I consider this fact very material to the honorable chairman as well as to the gentlemen of this House, showing that the committee acted with entire liberality and kept their minds open to whatever might be urged on the subject.

Mr. HOUSE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. McLANE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOUSE. Does the gentleman say at first the entire committee was in favor of reporting the bill unanimously?

Mr. McLANE. The committee were not committed to support it, but to report it, reserving to themselves any opposition they might make to it in this House.

Mr. HOUSE. How long ago was that?

Mr. McLANE. Two months ago nearly.

Mr. O'NEILL. The committee did not agree to report the bill in such a way as to bind the action of members of the committee, but to report it allowing each member to vote on it as he saw fit.

Mr. McLANE. In conclusion, I wish to say to this House that no matter what was the spirit in which those remarks were made, I do not think such remarks proper. I do not think gentlemen can maintain agreeable relations while deliberating together in this House or on a committee if they indulge in any such feelings; and I desire further to say that I do not think the facts of the case justify any feeling at all. I do not think there was anything to justify any feeling which could induce the least complaint on the part of the chairman; so that, so far as I am concerned as his colleague, I think the remarks themselves were not proper, and I think they were made altogether without justification.

Mr. REAGAN. I am very sorry, Mr. Speaker, that the statement of facts which I made, which no one has controverted or will controvert, was not satisfactory to my friend from Maryland. He reminds me, sir, of an incident that I have heard of, where a gentleman borrowed some money from another and gave his note for it. After the note was overdue the creditor asked payment and the debtor told him, "I always intended to pay that note if you did not make me mad; but I was almost sure from the start you would make me mad." I am satisfied I can say nothing which can satisfy the gentleman from Maryland.

The history which that gentleman has given of this matter, I appeal to his candor, is not a fair one. I appealed to the committee to act on that subject during the extra session of Congress, and urged action on it repeatedly. Action was declined, because it was not proposed to take up general legislation during that session. I urged action afterward, and, as gentlemen have stated, the committee kindly consented that I should report the bill, reserving to each member the right to amend or oppose the bill. Between the time I was authorized to report the bill and the making of the report, I received letters, as probably other members did, from presidents of the leading railroads of the United States, stating they had large interests that would in some degree be affected by the bill, and they ought to be heard.

I agreed with the balance of the committee that it was right to hear the representatives of these great interests, and we rescinded the resolution authorizing me to report the bill, I consenting with the other members of the committee so to do. We heard these gentlemen daily for two or three weeks. They were the ablest representatives of these great roads from all parts of the country. Upon that I was willing, and I suggested the desire a month or five weeks ago, that the committee should allow me, to make an adverse report of that bill in order to get the bill before the House. I was not permitted to make an adverse report. The bill was detained there in committee, and it is now in my hands, after nearly three months of this session have passed, with the privilege of asking the consideration of the three bills to be reported back. Whether the committee has been fairly willing to allow the House to consider that bill I submit to the judgment of the House upon these facts.

Mr. KENNA. I do not desire to detain the House, but as this matter seems to have excited some interest here, as it has commanded some attention on the part of the public prints, and as there seems to be some conflict of opinion among gentlemen who have addressed the House to-day about it, I will say a word or two.

What is known to the country as the Reagan interstate-commerce bill was referred this session, upon being introduced by that gentleman, to the Committee on Commerce. Upon the first consideration of that bill by the committee, the chairman of the committee was unanimously authorized, as I recollect, to report the bill to the House for consideration, each member of the committee, however, reserving to himself the right to vote for or against the bill in the House as investigation and examination might suggest to be proper.

After the bill had been so authorized to be reported a request was made that certain gentlemen interested in opposition to the bill should be heard before the committee. The authorization to report the bill was therefore by general consent withdrawn, and an opportunity for that hearing was given. The hearing was long and elaborate. At the conclusion of that hearing, and upon the final vote upon the question of reporting the bill to the House as it stood, those voting in the negative proved to be in the majority. Afterward a motion to reconsider the whole proceeding was adopted, and the subsequent action of the committee resulted in the adoption of a substitute, with the right reserved to the chairman of the committee to offer his own original bill in the House as a substitute for the one directed to be reported.

Now I want to call the attention of the House in this matter to two things. In the first place, I do not see how it could be claimed at any time either that the gentleman from Texas intended to assert, or that there could be any reason for such an assertion, that the Committee on Commerce was packed in the interest of either one side or the other of that bill. I make that statement having in view the fact that the committee took the action which it did take upon the subject, for a committee selected with a view to defeat and smother the bill would hardly have agreed so promptly to report it; nor would such a committee have reported a substitute, for that would have the effect of bringing the whole matter before the House.

The other fact to which I desire to call attention is this, and it is a matter, with all due deference to all concerned, with regard to which I hardly think the proceedings here this morning do justice to the chairman of that committee. When the final vote was taken in that committee upon the question of reporting the substitute to the House, some expression did fall from the lips of the chairman of the committee about the constitution of the committee; there was some difference of opinion in the committee growing out of that expression.

I state but the truth when I say here that there were members of that committee who attached a construction to the language used by the chairman which made it in no wise offensive. There were others, however, who very promptly stated what their construction of the language was; and immediately upon that statement the chairman of the committee, in the committee, at the time, as he has since done in the public press of the country, disavowed any such intention, or that there was any propriety in such construction of his language.

Now, I submit whether it is fair to the chairman of that committee, or to any member of the committee, or to any member of this House, to enter upon a long and weary discussion here, to go forth to the country, upon the construction of language uttered by a man who, at the very time it was suggested to him that it was subject to that construction, then and there repudiated it.

So far as the charge is concerned that there was a movement on foot to censure the chairman of the committee or any other member of that committee, there is nothing in it. I will add that the relations of the different members of that committee, so far as I know, the relations of every one to every other, have been of a most cordial kind; and I am unaware at this time that anything has occurred to disturb those relations. I concur in the statement of the gentleman from Connecticut, and I have nothing more to say.

POST-OFFICE BUILDING AT BALTIMORE.

Mr. KIMMEL. I ask unanimous consent to report at this time, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, for present consideration, a bill providing for the purchase of a site for a post-office building in the city of Baltimore. I am instructed by the committee to report that bill and ask for its present consideration.

Mr. PAGE. I must object, for the reason that there are many other similar bills in a like situation, and we all desire to have them passed. It is not that I object to this particular bill.

Mr. KIMMEL. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement. This bill differs from the other bills in the committee—

Mr. BREWER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. PAGE. At the request of the gentleman from Maryland I withdraw my objection.

Mr. KIMMEL. I ask that the House proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BREWER] withdraw the call for the regular order?

Mr. BREWER. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the bill is not before the House.

ELECTION CONTEST—CURTIN VS. YOCUM.

Mr. SPRINGER, from the Committee of Elections, submitted a report on the contested-election case of Andrew G. Curtin vs. SETH H. YOCUM, from the twentieth congressional district of Pennsylvania. The resolution accompanying the report was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the election held in the twentieth congressional district of Pennsylvania in November, 1878, for a member of this House, be, and the same is hereby, declared null and void, and the seat now occupied by SETH H. YOCUM declared vacant until filled by the people of said district in conformity with law.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FIELD] desire, on behalf of the minority of the committee, to submit their views in writing.

Mr. CALKINS. I submit the views of a minority, consisting of three members of the committee. I ask that the resolution accompanying this statement be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That SETH H. YOCUM is entitled to retain his seat in the Forty-sixth Congress as a member from the twentieth congressional district of Pennsylvania, and that Andrew G. Curtin is not entitled thereto.

Mr. FIELD. I present the views of certain members of the Committee of Elections, which are designed to accompany the minority views already submitted by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS.]

The SPEAKER. Does the statement submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FIELD] embrace any resolution?

Mr. FIELD. There is no resolution accompanying this statement.

Mr. CALKINS. I understand that the gentlemen signing the paper presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FIELD] concur in the conclusion embraced in the resolution accompanying the minority report already submitted by myself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not advised on that point. The paper will speak for itself.

Mr. FIELD. The paper will show that we do concur in the conclusion presented by the minority views submitted by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CALKINS.]

Mr. KEIFER. The two minority reports agree in recommending the adoption of the resolution already read as a part of the views submitted by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask that the report of the committee, together with the views of the minority, be printed and laid on the table.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. SPRINGER. I give notice that I shall call up this case for discussion on Tuesday next after the morning hour, to be continued from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I hope the gentleman will not make this subject a special order for that day, as the Committee of Ways and Means desire to occupy the floor at that time.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not propose to make this case a special order. I have simply given notice that I shall call it up at that time, in accordance with the determination of the committee. If the House should not desire to consider it of course it will not do so.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I shall certainly oppose bringing the case up at that time.

The SPEAKER. The question is one for the House to settle. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has simply given the notice usual in contested-election cases.

CRIMES RELATING TO COINS.

Mr. VANCE, from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 4308, a bill (H. R. No. 4735) to punish certain crimes relating to the coins of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

MAIL TRANSPORTATION ON STAR ROUTES.

Mr. BLOUNT, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4736) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriations for the transportation of the mails on star routes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, so much thereof be, and the same is hereby, appropriated as may be required to meet the expenses of inland mail transportation on star routes for the remainder of the current fiscal year at or within existing contract prices: Provided, That upon any route where there has been an increase of the original contract price during the last or the current fiscal year exceeding $5,000 the compensation on such routes shall be reduced to the terms of the original contract on and after the 1st day of March next, but nothing herein contained shall be construed to forbid the payment to contractors of the one month's pay as is usual in case of reduction or termination of contracts.

Sec. 2. That the further sum of $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated as aforesaid, to enable the Postmaster-General to place new service as authorized by law, and the further sum of $100,000 to increase the service on existing routes, including those on which a reduction has been provided for by the preceding section: Provided, That no increase shall exceed the rate of $5,000 a year upon any one route.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] desire to consider this bill in the House or in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. BLOUNT. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report the bill, and to move that it be printed and recommitted. I give notice that I shall take the first opportunity to-morrow to bring the bill before the House for consideration.

Mr. CONGER. Why not to-day?

Mr. BLOUNT. The bill has not been printed.

The motion of Mr. BLOUNT that the bill be printed and recommitted was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced the passage of a bill (H. R. No. 3058) authorizing the remission or refunding of duty on an altar from Rome, Italy, for Saint John's cathedral, of Indianapolis, Indiana.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE COURTS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the morning hour begins at twelve minutes past one o'clock, and the House resumes the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, being the bill (H. R. No. 4219) to amend sections 1, 2, 3, and 10 of an act to determine the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, and to regulate the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1875. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAPHAM] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. Speaker, the discussion upon the bill under consideration has been so extended and exhaustive of the questions involved, that I should shrink from further taxing the attention and perhaps the patience of the House but for the great importance of the measure. At the hazard of repeating much which has been more forcibly urged by those who have preceded me, I desire to dwell briefly upon the more important changes in the law which will be wrought out by the passage of this bill.

The constitutional provisions which must form the basis of all legislation on the subject are found in articles 1 and 3 of that instrument. Article 3, section 1, provides that—

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

In the eighth section of article 1 the legislative power is granted to Congress "to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court." It will be seen that but one Supreme Court is established by the Constitution. All other or inferior courts must be created by the action of Congress under and in pursuance of the power thus conferred. The control of the Congress over such inferior courts is complete and unlimited, except the boundaries within which the power shall be exercised are fixed and defined by another section of the Constitution to which I shall presently refer.

To "constitute, ordain, and establish" inferior courts are terms denoting the exercise of the most plenary power in relation to such tribunals.

In the preamble to the instrument it is declared that the people of the United States "do ordain and establish this Constitution." These words are used to describe the exercise of an act of sovereignty, and the use of the same words in the grant to the Congress implies a kindred exercise of power over the subject of inferior courts. Nothing was done in regard to them in the Constitution except to delegate the power to be thereafter exercised and only to be exercised by Congress within the boundaries fixed as I have before suggested.

The three words "constitute, ordain, and establish" were employed to emphasize the grant of power, and either would have been ample to confer it. They are practically synonymous, but the word "ordain" is, perhaps, the most expressive of the three. It is said that "Providence ordains."

The unrivaled genius of Shakespeare has thus expressed it:

Our ancestor was that Malmuthus, which Ordain'd our laws;

Who was the first of Britain, which did put His brows within a golden crown, and call'd Himself a king.

Congress, under this grant of power, could have created as many inferior tribunals as it deemed necessary, and have invested each with so much of jurisdiction as it deemed wise and expedient. The jurisdiction of the circuit might have been confined to criminal cases or cases in admiralty; the district courts to common law actions, or vice versa.

Having thus delegated to the Congress the whole control of the powers and jurisdiction of all inferior courts, the Constitution, in section 2 of article 3, provides:

The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority;—to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens or subjects.

In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State shall be party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact; with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed.

The original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is here defined, but the whole appellate jurisdiction is given to Congress. Those cases, and only those, which fall within the classes prescribed by law, as to the nature of the questions, the character of the parties, and the amount involved can be removed to the Supreme Court for the exercise of its appellate powers.

By the terms of the judiciary act of 1789, an act emanating from the framers of the Constitution, limitations and restrictions were made both as respects the character of the parties and the amount involved in controversies. The constitutionality of such limitations and restrictions has always been upheld by the Supreme Court. It was provided that the circuit courts should only have jurisdiction of cases in which the demand exceeded $500, exclusive of costs; also, that they should not have jurisdiction of actions upon promissory notes or other choses in action in the name of an assignee unless the assignor could have maintained the action, save in the cases of foreign bills of exchange. The jurisdiction by the terms of the act was made concurrent with that of the State courts, but the act provided that in all actions commenced in a State court when the nature of the action was such as to be within the jurisdiction of the circuit court the defendant might, in the mode therein provided, remove the cause into such court.

Under this act it has been repeatedly held, both by the State and Federal courts, that although the Constitution has defined the limits of the judicial power it has not prescribed how much of it shall be exercised by the circuit courts. (Turner vs. Bank of North America, 4 Dall., 10; Kendall vs. United States, 12 Pet., 616; Carey vs. Curliss, 3 How., 245.)

In the case of Clark against the City of Janesville, reported in 4 American Law Register, 593, Judge Miller says:

It is well understood by those experienced in the jurisprudence of the United States that Congress has conferred upon the Federal courts but a portion of the jurisdiction contemplated by the Constitution.

The limit to the jurisdiction by confining it to cases involving the sum of $500, exclusive of costs, has remained the law to the present time.

By the act of 1875 the restriction imposed upon assignees of negotiable promissory notes was swept away and the distinction between such actions and actions upon other choses in action and foreign bills of exchange was abolished.

The bill under consideration restores the law of 1789 in this respect. The evils resulting from the change have been found so great, by colorable transfers for the purpose of conferring jurisdiction and otherwise, that there seems to be a demand for the restoration of the law as first enacted. It has become very apparent that the framers of the Constitution were wise in making the exception, although it had the effect to confine bona fide holders of negotiable paper to the State tribunals for the collection of their demands.

The act of 1875 made another important change by giving to the plaintiff as well as the defendant the power to remove the cause from the State to the United States courts. Under this law a party after having chosen his own forum was given the right to remove his cause against the wishes of the defendant. There was and is no necessity for this. The plaintiff could of course discontinue his cause in the State court, if he desired to do so, and commence a new action in any other court having jurisdiction. To the defendant, however, having no control over the selection, the right to remove the cause was of great value.

The bill in question restores the law of 1789 and gives to the defendant or defendants only the right of removal, except that on the ground of local prejudice and in order to obtain a fair trial either party may exercise the right.

The amount necessary to give jurisdiction or to authorize the removal from a State to the circuit is by the proposed bill fixed at the sum of $2,000, exclusive of interest and costs.

Mr. Speaker, there has been much said in the course of this discussion in opposition to the change thus proposed. My colleague on the committee [Mr. ROBINSON] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BARBER] have manifested a very earnest disapproval and insist that the amount originally named shall be retained. The sum of $500 was a larger proportionate sum in 1789 than the sum of $2,000 would be at the present day. Why was it fixed at $500? It would be difficult by reasoning to say upon principle that a claim of $499 should be excluded and one of $501 included in the jurisdiction of the Federal courts. So in the seventh article of the amendments, which provides that the right of trial by jury shall be preserved in actions at common law where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, it is difficult to perceive why trial by jury should be denied to a claimant whose demand is $19.90 and preserved to one whose demand is $20.10. It is a significant fact in our history that the judiciary act fixing $500 as the lowest limit of jurisdiction in the circuit courts of the United States was enacted on the 24th day of September, 1789, and on the next day, September 25, 1789, the same Congress proposed the amendment I have quoted preserving the right of trial by jury in all controversies exceeding $20.

The same Congress had just provided that unless a claim exceeded $500 it could not be prosecuted in or removed for trial to the circuit court it had "ordained and established." The right of trial by jury was thus preserved for other courts and for State tribunals upon demands exceeding $20 and not exceeding $500. It is conceded that the limit to be fixed rests in the discretion of Congress. Analogous limitations are found in the legislation of most if not all the States between the supreme and inferior courts of such States. It is not solely or mainly for the privilege or benefit of capitalists as plaintiffs that this is done. A defendant has an interest as well. It is quite important to him whether he shall be compelled to go with his witnesses hundreds of miles to try his cause instead of having it tried in his own vicinage or county.

More than this, it was the design of the framers of our system to make the Federal courts not the general courts for litigants but exceptional courts, and to clothe them with a dignity by the very nature and amount of the controversies over which they should have jurisdiction. For this reason they withheld from them a large portion of the jurisdiction which it is conceded might have been conferred upon them under the Constitution. The increase of the amount of controversies from $500 to $2,000, is in the spirit which prompted the first limitation, and will not, in my opinion, exclude as large a proportion of the litigation of the country as was shut out by the act of 1789. I deem the change a wise one, and consider this feature of the proposed bill the most important and desirable one contained in it.

The only remaining portion to which I shall refer is the closing paragraph of the third section, in these words:

That the circuit courts of the United States shall not take original cognizance of any suit of a civil nature, either at common law or in equity, between a corporation created or organized by or under the laws of any State and a citizen of any State in which such corporation at the time the cause of action accrued may have been carrying on any business authorized by the law creating it, except in like cases in which said courts are authorized by this act to take original cognizance of suits between citizens of the same State. Nor shall any such suit between such a corporation and a citizen or citizens of a State in which it may be doing business, be removed to any circuit court of the United States, except in like cases in which such removal is authorized by the foregoing provision in suits between citizens of the same State.

At the time of the passage of the first judiciary act there was no necessity for any such restriction as is contained in this portion of the section. The rapid multiplication of corporations under State authority, coupled with the fact that such corporations have been allowed by the comity of other States to transact business therein, creates the supposed necessity and propriety of this enactment.

Mr. Speaker, the subject is one by no means free from difficulty. If the legislation can be so limited as to apply only to the classes of cases intended by it, I have arrived at the conclusion it is free from any constitutional objection.

It does not apply to the cases of corporations created by or under the laws of the United States, nor do I think the language is broad enough to include foreign corporations. The design is this: that if a corporation created or organized under the law of Massachusetts shall send its agents into the State of California, and by the comity of that State be permitted to transact business there, in controversies between it and citizens of California growing out of such transactions it shall be treated as a citizen of that State and excluded from the Federal courts. Can Congress impose this restriction? We have no national legislation on the subject. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that a corporation created by and transacting business in a State is to be deemed an inhabitant of that State, capable of being treated as a citizen for all purposes of suing and being sued. (Brightly's Digest of Laws, page 9, and cases cited in note d.) By the Revised Statutes the word "person" may extend and be applied to corporations. (Sections 1 and 5013.) Similar provisions are doubtless contained in the statutes of every State in the Union. I know it is the law of New York. It has been held that citizenship, when spoken of in the Constitution in reference to the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, means nothing more than residence. (Gassies vs. Ballou, 6 Peters, 761; Shelton vs. Tiffin, 6 Howard, 163.)

Now, granting a corporation is to be deemed a citizen of the State in which it is created and transacts its business, what is the status of such a corporation in a State other than that of its creation, where by the comity of that other State it is permitted to transact business? If it is uncertain and as yet undefined, can Congress determine it for the purpose of limiting or conferring jurisdiction upon the courts? It is true that a corporation can only act by agents; it is equally true that while its business is confined to the State of its creation and is only transacted with citizens of the same State, whether it shall be deemed a citizen or person or resident of that State, it cannot sue or be sued in the Federal courts, except in cases where actions may be brought between citizens of the same State. If a corporation of Massachusetts then goes (so far as it is capable of going) to California and by virtue of the legislation of California engages in its business there, why may it not be treated for the purposes of jurisdiction as if it were a corporation of the State under whose laws and by whose comity it is acting? Residence, as I have shown, is the meaning of the term used in the Constitution. If an inhabitant of Massachusetts should remove to California and engage in business there, no one would question his inability to prosecute causes in the Federal courts against the residents of the same State. But the citizen may go by the fiat of another provision of the Constitution, (article 4, section 2.) Not so with a State corporation. It has no extra-territorial rights. It can go only where legislation permits it to come; and in the case I have supposed is adopted by the State of California and transacting business there—a very slight shade of difference between its status and that of having been created by its laws and doing business there.

The First Congress solemnly enacted a law under which if a citizen or corporation of California should make and deliver a negotiable promissory note to another citizen or corporation of the same State, and such note in the due course of business should be transferred to a resident of Massachusetts, who in good faith should become the owner of the same, he as such owner could have no standing in the Federal courts. This legislation has been pronounced constitutional. Why? Because Congress has the power under the Constitution to make the exclusion. No State constitution would permit it. Because the principles of the common law are reserved to the States. Congress could not constitutionally enact that such holder should not sue in a State court, but must sue in the Federal court.

Mr. Speaker, we propose in this bill to return to this exclusion of actions upon commercial paper, except foreign bills of exchange, and I am sure if that can be done for reasons of public policy the prohibition as to corporations transacting business out of the States of their creation can also be maintained as a constitutional exercise of the powers of Congress. It rests entirely with Congress to say whether the circuit court shall have jurisdiction in any action by or against a corporation created by State law, and if that power exists the clause of the bill I am now considering is not obnoxious to any constitutional objection.

One word further, Mr. Speaker, and I have done. The gentleman from Massachusetts, my colleague on the committee, [Mr. ROBINSON,] has referred to the struggle on the part of Wisconsin to place corporations of other States and foreign corporations on a par in this respect with domestic corporations in that State, and to the fact that an agreement made by the Home Insurance Company of New York not to remove causes to the Federal courts was repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and therefore void. The case reported in 20 Wallace was decided by a divided court, and is an instructive one for reference. In the case of Paul vs. Virginius, 8 Wall, 168, Justice Field is quoted as saying:

Having no absolute right of recognition in other States, but depending for such recognition and the enforcement of its contracts upon their assent, it follows, as a matter of course, that such assent may be granted upon such terms and conditions as those States may think proper to impose. They may exclude the foreign corporation entirely, they may restrict its business to particular localities, or they may exact such security for the performance of its contracts with their citizens as in their judgment will best promote the public interest.

The Chief Justice in his dissenting opinion, in which he was supported by Judge Davis, says:

I cannot concur in the judgment which has just been announced. A State has the right to exclude foreign insurance companies from the transaction of business within its jurisdiction. Such is the settled law in this court. The right to impose conditions upon admission follows as a necessary consequence from the right to exclude altogether. The State of Wisconsin has made it a condition of admission that the company shall submit to be sued in the courts she has provided for the settlement of the rights of her own citizens. That is no more than saying that the foreign company must, for the purposes of all litigation growing out of the business transacted there, renounce its foreign citizenship and become pro tanto a citizen of that State. There is no hardship in this, for it imposes no greater burden than rests upon home companies and home insurers.

Mr. Speaker, this case illustrates the necessity for the proposed legislation. It will remove all conflict between the different corporations transacting business in a State and result in harmony of interest and practice and will take away all inducement to impose the conditions thus far attempted.

The decision referred to affords a cogent reason for the last provision of the pending bill. It will take away the law of the United States which made the arrangement obnoxious to its provisions. I think it will be hailed as a measure ending conflict, as in the interests of harmony, as beneficial to State corporations going into other States by placing them on an equality with domestic corporations of such States.

I yield seven minutes of my time to the gentleman from New Jersey. Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Speaker, I cannot enter into any discussion of this case even for the short time which is allotted me without expressing my gratification at the ability and temper which have been illustrated in its progress.

I shall not discuss the bill generally, but shall only make one or two suggestions with regard to that clause of the bill which limits the rights of corporations and those who deal with corporations in the United States courts. By a provision of the Constitution of the United States the judicial power of the United States extends to controversies between citizens of different States. I admit for the purpose of this discussion that Congress has the power to distribute this jurisdiction among inferior courts, and that it has the power, if not the right, to withhold a portion of that jurisdiction. But the question returns, Upon what principle shall they withhold it? The clause of the Constitution which refers to the jurisdiction of Congress uses the term "between citizens of different States," meaning by these general terms between suable persons residing in different States. It is proper to understand the effect of this provision of the bill on this power.

The provision to which I refer is in substance this:

The circuit courts of the United States shall not take original cognizance of any suit of a civil nature, either at common law or equity, between any State corporation and the citizen of any State in which such corporation is authorized to do business.

And the further provision is in effect that no suit in State courts between such parties shall be removed to United States courts.

My first remark is that this proposition is far more general in its nature, I think, than was intended by the gentleman who reported it. It applies to all cases of every kind arising between citizens of any State where foreign corporations do any business. If a New York corporation does me a civil injury in the State of New Jersey, I must sue them in the State courts of the State of New York unless I can catch them in New Jersey. I, as a citizen not a corporation, am deprived of my right of taking them into the circuit court in the district in which their property is located. I am deprived, not by my own act but by the act of my State, of my constitutional right of going into the United States court, a right which may remain to citizens of other States. Let us understand the principle upon which this right depends. Corporations are held to be citizens under this clause of the Constitution which extends the judicial power to citizens of different States, not because they are corporations but because they represent the natural citizens who are behind them and whose interests, organized and combined in these corporate bodies, are to be affected; whose property rights as natural citizens are at stake. The Supreme Court has held that that clause—and I think I quote the language of the court exactly—relates to "all citizens in all their rights," and therefore it held that corporations being a mere organized fiction behind which stood natural persons, they were entitled to the benefit of that clause of the Constitution.

THE SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ROBESON. I will, then, only pause to call attention to the fact that this provision not only affects the rights of corporations to sue, but it affects the rights of all citizens in States where corporations do business to sue corporations and to carry them, if they choose, into the courts of the United States—a right given them by the Constitution. This at least takes away from certain natural citizens, for causes not within their control, certain rights which remain to other citizens of the same nature and quality. Whatever may be said about corporations, this point does not come within their scope.

There are several other suggestions I should like to make, but must take some other occasion.

Mr. LAPHAM. I now yield what is left of my time to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, addressed the House. [He remarks will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask whether the morning hour has expired?

THE SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to proceed with the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules, and, pending that, I move that all debate on the pending amendment be limited to five minutes.

Mr. KIMMEL. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] to yield to me for five minutes.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I would have to yield to twenty more if I did.

APPROPRIATION FOR UNITED STATES MARSHALS.

THE SPEAKER. The Chair presents to the House a communication from the President of the United States, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Attorney-General with reference to the requisite appropriation for the current fiscal year for the compensation of the marshals of the United States, including their reimbursement for necessary expenditures in the discharge of their official duties.

R. B. HAYES.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 24, 1880.

The SPEAKER. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WHITE. And printed.

Mr. CONGER. Let the accompanying paper be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, February 20, 1880.

SIR: I desire respectfully to call your attention to the subject of the appropriation for the current fiscal year for the fees and expenditures of the marshals of the United States in the performance of the duties of their offices.

The last Congress, and the present Congress at its first session, adjourned without making any appropriation for these officers. In my annual report I have fully stated to the Senate and House of Representatives the condition in which they were left by this failure. Since the 1st of July last they have carried on their offices without any appropriation, and have not only been without compensation for themselves and their deputies, but have advanced the sums necessary to be expended in order that the process of the United States might not fail, having fulfilled substantially all their official duties. I am informed from many of them that they have now reached the limit of their capacity thus to conduct their offices, and a failure by them in the administration of their offices is necessarily a failure to execute the laws of the United States, which in such case would occur by reason of the want of suitable appropriations. I need not enumerate the vast number of cases in which such failure would be attended with grave results, disastrous in some cases to individuals and in others to the public justice of the United States. Nearly eight months of the current fiscal year have now elapsed. I feel that these officers are entitled to great credit for the exertions they have heretofore made. I have no doubt they will continue to do their best; but, in view of the heavy pressure upon them, I trust that Congress will, as soon as possible, show them that the confidence they have felt that the appropriation would be made for their legitimate fees and expenditures has not been misplaced.

As the head of the Department of Justice, I have felt it my duty to inform you of the condition in which these officers now find themselves, and the consequent effects to be anticipated in the administration of public justice, in order that you may, should you deem it proper, communicate with Congress upon the subject, and urge upon that body, with as much earnestness as it may properly be done, a prompt disposition of this matter.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHAS. DEVENS,
Attorney-General.

To the PRESIDENT.

The message of the President was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REVISION OF RULES.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and pending that motion he moves that all debate on the pending amendment be closed in five minutes.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The pending amendment is that offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. OSCAR TURNER.]

Mr. CONGER. The motion, as I understand it, does not cut off further amendment.

The SPEAKER. It cuts off neither amendment nor debate on such other amendments as may be offered.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

Mr. BLACKBURN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CARLISLE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole resumes consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules, and by order of the House all debate on the pending amendment is limited to five minutes. The pending question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. OSCAR TURNER,] as modified at the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. TOWNSEND.]

Mr. OSCAR TURNER's amendment, as modified, was as follows:

Add to Rule XXIV the following:

When a public bill, resolution, or proposition shall have been referred to a standing or select committee of the House and no report has been made thereon for thirty days, it shall be in order for the member who introduced said bill, resolution, or proposition, on any Monday, immediately after the expiration of the morning hour, to offer a resolution or move to place said bill, resolution, or proposition on the proper calendar, which resolution shall then be considered, and, if decided in the affirmative, the bill, resolution, or proposition shall be placed on the Calendar, and the committee discharged from further consideration of the same.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. I offer a modification of the amendment which I offered on Friday last.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to Rule XXIV the following:

When a public bill, resolution, or proposition shall have been referred to a standing or select committee of the House and no report has been made thereon for thirty days, it shall be in order for the member who introduced said bill, resolution, or proposition, on any Monday, immediately after the expiration of the morning hour, to offer a resolution or move to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the same, which resolution or motion shall then be considered, and, if decided in the affirmative, the committee shall be discharged, and the bill, resolution, or proposition shall be placed on a proper calendar, unless a majority of the House shall determine then to consider the same.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. Mr. Chairman, as I have before presented my views to the committee on this amendment, I shall not trespass further than to simply say that there can be no abuse of the privilege given a member under this amendment, because it is to the interest of every member that he shall have the benefit of the report of a committee in his favor on any bill, resolution, or proposition referred to a committee, and no member will ever exercise the right given him under this amendment if the committee is engaged in investigating the matter. It will never be resorted to except when a committee refuses to report the bill back to the House, either favorably or unfavorably. In that event the remedy afforded by this amendment not only guards the personal right of the member who offers a bill or proposition, but, sir, it guards the rights of the majority of this House, for it secures to them the right to pass a bill or resolution if a majority are in favor of it, or to put it upon the Calendar. If this amendment is not adopted the power is left in the hands of a committee to stifle and defeat the will of a majority by refusing to report back to this House a bill, resolution, or proposition that has been referred to it.

If this amendment is defeated you give up the power of this House to legislate or pass a bill that a majority is in favor of, simply because a committee will not report back the bill, either favorably or unfavorably, that this House is in favor of which has been referred to it; thus recognizing in a committee a power dangerous to the liberties and rights of the people by leaving it in the power of a few members on a committee to stifle and defeat the will of a majority of this House, for under these rules there is no remedy provided to force a committee to report back a bill which has been referred to them.

Mr. Chairman, I offered this amendment because I knew it was important, and would, if adopted, enable us to legislate for the interest of the people.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. MYERS.]

Mr. MYERS. The power of the committees of this House has reached a point startling to all lovers of democratic government, and smacks strongly of the star-chamber and secret doings of the privy council. Measures of "great pith and moment" are even, when backed by a strong support of the people's representatives on this floor, consigned to premature graves without examination or the slightest regard to the wishes of their authors; and the whole power of this House under the existing rules and those that are proposed by the committee are unequal to the task of rescuing from the fatal pigeon-hole bills of the utmost importance to our constituents. We have heard much of the abuses of the veto power by the Executive, and yet we find members of this body who are most turbulent in their frothy assaults the most clamorous for conferring powers upon a single committee which far exceed those of the veto power. The Executive can do no more than return a bill with his objections to the House in which it originated; but your autocratic committee may refuse to notice them at all, and say to this House, "you shall not even consider these bills; we do not think it proper to trust you with such matters, and we know more about the welfare of the country than all of you put together." I need scarcely remind gentlemen on this floor that at the late extra session a bill known as the "Warner silver bill" passed this House by a large majority, nor call to mind the humiliation to which they were subjected by the refusal of the chairman of a single committee of the Senate to even report the bill. And yet that very Senator was more violent in his denunciation of Mr. Hayes for his use of the veto power than perhaps any member upon the floor of either House; a terrible thing is this one man power in the hands of the Executive of the United States, but a charming constitutional democratic affair when in possession of the chairman of a committee, especially if he happen to be chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

But, sir, I am far from charging that the chairman of this most potent committee is more arrogant and self-sufficient than others, for they all seem to be tarred with the same paddle and to think the rest of us who are sent here to represent our constituents are a mere set of supernumeraries to hoist or let down the curtain when they so direct.

I had the honor at an early day of this session to present for the consideration of this House a bill to substitute national Treasury notes for national bank notes, as a measure in which my constituents and the whole people of my State feel the deepest interest, and upon which I am anxious to have the views of members from other sections of the Union. But in calling on the high dignitary, the chairman of the great Committee on Banking and Currency, I was coolly informed that he did not intend to report it at all, though he confessed that he had never examined the bill, and then quoted other distinguished members of the committee in connection with himself as being opposed to any legislation upon national banks more than the bill that was so ignominiously set down on a few days ago in this House; and for no other reason, as I verily believe, than that the previous question was demanded and a free, full, and fair discussion refused by the gentleman who had the bill in charge. Sir, if we are to have no other agency in framing the laws of our country than to record the acts of the chairman of a committee, why not let us supernumeraries go home and save the expense of remaining in Washington and the shame of so servile a position in the Capitol of the American nation.

Sir, the people of my State are jealous of the one-man power, and I fear it will be difficult to convince them that its exercise in the hands of the chairman of a Senate committee, though he be a distinguished Senator from the State of Delaware, or the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations or of Banking and Currency in this House, possibly not less famous than the Senator, will be less liable to abuse or more democratic in principle than if exercised by a republican Executive.

The haughty disdain with which members of this House who seek a hearing before some of these committees are treated by the arrogant assumption of those who chance to fill the important position of chairman should remind us of the stern necessity imposed by self-respect to clip their wings and teach them that we have not yet abdicated the rights conferred upon us by an enlightened constituency, nor do we intend to transfer to their hands the sole power of framing our legislation.

I shall heartily support the amendment offered by the honorable member from Kentucky, [Mr. OSCAR TURNER.]

I say this, sir, in sorrow rather than anger, for I cheerfully confess the great improvements made in the general code of rules reported by the distinguished committee who have had charge of the matter.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to say simply that I have no authority to speak for the Committee on Rules upon the subject of the amendment offered by my colleague, [Mr. OSCAR TURNER.] The scope of the amendment is very broad; its effect will be very noticeable. After a careful consideration of it from our adjournment on Friday last until now, speaking for myself and disclaiming any authority to speak for the Committee on Rules or any other member of it, I will say that I believe the amendment is in the right direction and should be adopted by the House.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. I move to strike out the last word. I desire but a few moments to call the attention of the members of the Committee of the Whole to a matter which has been under consideration within the last few days. There was a statement made on Friday last which it seems to me does great injustice to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, great injustice to this Congress, and still greater injustice to unpensioned soldiers of this country. I for one am not willing that that statement shall go out unchallenged to the people of the country. My colleague from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] in the discussion at that time said:

If this House should do no other business from now until the end of the session—indeed, Mr. Chairman, if we should sit here from now until the first Monday of December next, and devote three hours a day every day to the consideration of the pension bills now pending before the two Houses of Congress and give ten minutes to each case we could not get through the list.

Well, he seemed to warm up a little with his own eloquence and got stronger before he went on much further, for he said:

Why, if we should give fair consideration—

Now, I do not know what he considers "fair consideration." What he said was:

If we give fair consideration to pension cases, give the time that it would seem ought to be given to them, we could not get through this session with the cases that are now on the Calendar from Pennsylvania alone.

Mr. WHITE. Who said that?

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. My colleague, [Mr. WARNER.] Now, there is one of two things pretty certain, either my colleague has been more successful with his pensioners—

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. My point of order is that the gentleman is not debating the amendment under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course it is impossible for the Chair to say in advance the relation that the remarks of the gentleman may have to the pending amendment.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. I am coming to that in a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a very difficult matter always for a presiding officer to rule in advance that what a gentleman is saying or may say has no reference to the pending proposition.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It is a very easy matter for the Chair to rule in this case.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] seems to have the floor a good deal of the time in order and out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] will proceed in order.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. I will endeavor to do so. There is one thing pretty certain, that my worthy colleague from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER], having been successful himself in his own pension case, either considers these matters are not worthy of attention or else he has got into some very wild flat inflation arithmetic, what might be called metaphorical arithmetic. He says "we could not get through this session with the cases that are now on the Calendar from Pennsylvania alone."

Sir, I hold in my hand the Private Calendar of this House. On that Calendar there are only thirty-two pension cases from Pennsylvania. There are on it fifty-two pension cases reported by the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, [Mr. COFFROTH], only thirty-two of which are from Pennsylvania. Now, sir, if this House has not time to consider thirty-two pension cases, after having wasted weeks and months on moonshine inflation financial doctrines, it is about time that we should commence holding longer sessions than three hours a day. A day's work for a Government employé is at least eight hours.

In my judgment Congress has no duty that is now so binding, so imperative upon it, and so important to the people of the country as the consideration of these pension claims. Besides, the gentleman has figured it down very fine. He says that there have been introduced into this House, or into Congress, between three thousand five hundred and four thousand bills granting pensions. Are all these bills to come up for consideration? In a great number of these cases there will be found three bills in the House and one in the Senate, sometimes two in the Senate and one in the House, for the identically same pension. Therefore it does not make that many different cases. Again, a large portion of the cases before the Pension Committee are cases which year after year, and by committee after committee, have been reported adversely upon, and they need not and will not claim the attention of this House. So that a few hundred are really all the cases that need claim the time of Congress.

But I will not consent that the disabled and still unpensioned soldiers of the Union Army shall be told that there is no chance for their claims to be heard, and, if just, allowed; shall be told, if these claims by reason of some technical defect in the evidence are rejected by the Pension Office, that this Congress is too august a body or too busy discussing theoretical finance—on which it has wasted weeks—to hear the claims for simple justice of the men without whose sacrifices we would to-day have no Congress, no Government, and no Treasury.

Within the last year the Pension Office has granted ten thousand pensions, eight thousand have been increased, and fifteen thousand "arrears." Congress, since 1862, has granted, by special acts, relief to fourteen hundred sufferers, and now it would require but a few weeks to settle every case worthy of attention. It has no work which is so much its duty; a soldier's claim is not a mere money title. It is not only justice, but appeals alike to the nation's honor and its pride.

Eighty-six years ago day after to-morrow this Government, under Washington, inaugurated the plan of sending pension claims to a committee of this House organized for that purpose, and has followed it ever since. Forty-nine years ago a Committee on Invalid Pensions, as now organized, was regularly charged with its present duties.

My colleague says he has a better plan. If it be such I will gladly accept it. But while this is the only mode known to our Government let us go faithfully forward in it to do what little we may of justice to the men and the families of the men by whose valor and sacrifices the nation marched to victory and peace.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. Well, there was a word or two more, but I will write out the rest as others do. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER. I wish to reply only to the arithmetic of my colleague from Ohio, [Mr. UPDEGRAFF.] I assumed that the report that the number of pension bills pending before this House and the Senate was between three and four thousand was correct. If there are three thousand, and ten minutes be given to each bill, it would take, as I figure it, thirty thousand minutes to consider these bills alone. That would be five hundred hours, and supposing three hours a day be given to them, it would take one hundred and sixty-six days, and giving twenty days to a month, which is as many days as the House is in session on the average, it would take something over eight months. My arithmetic, therefore, was right.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. How many days in a month do you say there are?

Mr. WARNER. I am calculating on the basis of twenty days in a month as the average number the House is in session.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. You said "every day."

Mr. WARNER. Twenty legislative days in a month. It would take then about eight months to go over or pass three thousand pension bills, giving ten minutes only to each case. And there will be twice three thousand bills here before this Congress terminates, if it is understood that the time of the House is to be taken up in this way.

Mr. WRIGHT. What arithmetic is the gentleman referring to?

Mr. WARNER. I suggest to my friend from Pennsylvania that when he gets home he quietly take up his paper and pencil and figure this out for himself. I suggest that my colleague do the same.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. I have done it.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to make reply to anything further; but I still insist—

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman will allow me to call his attention to an inaccuracy in his statement of the time it will take to pass pension bills. The Committee of the Whole the other day, on motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. OSCAR TURNER], inserted in these rules a provision that not a dollar shall be appropriated by this House without a call of the yeas and nays; so that under this rule, as amended, it is going to take an hour to read the report and call the yeas and nays on every pension bill presented here. I simply call attention to this because it seems to me the amendment must be voted out when we get into the House.

Mr. WARNER. The rule, as I understand, does not apply to private bills, but only to public bills.

Mr. FRYE. I do not so understand it. I think it applies to all.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. This amendment has no application to pension bills.

Mr. WARNER. I am informed that the provision referred to applies only to public bills, not to private bills.

I still insist that the rule proposed here the other day would be entirely inadequate as a means to correct the evils complained of. This House is not the place to consider pension claims. A commission ought to be established and I hope will be to decide such cases under the law; and if my colleague will permit me—and I mean no personal offense—I will say further that all this talk about rushing pension bills through here is in my judgment mere demagogism—not action dictated by wisdom or sound policy, or even good common sense. The object too manifestly is to catch votes and not to promote the real interests of honest pension claimants.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. If anybody understands the demagogic business, I think it is my colleague. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER. I did not hear the remark of the gentleman.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend by striking out the last word.

Mr. FRYE. If the gentleman will yield to me one moment I wish to say that I find, on examining the amendment adopted on motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. OSCAR TURNER,] that I am strictly correct; that on every bill appropriating money or making any charge upon the people the yeas and nays must be called.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rose to say a word in regard to the pending amendment, which I hope gentlemen will look at carefully before they vote. I do not wish to delay action at all, but the amendment if adopted will throw the entire business of this House, as I think, into the utmost confusion. According to this proposition any bill, after having been in committee thirty days, may, by a majority vote of the House, be brought back here for action.

Now, there are scores of bills that cannot possibly be taken up, properly considered, and carried through a committee in thirty days. No one of the appropriation bills, except the smallest, can be run through committee with any kind of thoroughness in thirty days. Take the bill on commerce, which the Committee on Commerce has been engaged upon for two months and more; it is not ready. Take the bill relating to rivers and harbors; that we understand takes the whole winter to get it ready. Take a bill covering all the subjects of a tariff; no Ways and Means Committee, though it be the most industrious that ever sat here, can bring in a general tariff bill in less than three or four months. Yet here is a rule that would tumble any bill, however great, however voluminous, however complicated, back into the House, out of the hands of the committee, and put it upon its passage or send it to the Calendar instantly, whenever a majority can be obtained to support such a course. Under such a rule we should have heart-burnings between committees, plots against committees, plots between committees in all sorts of ways. I trust that gentlemen who desire to have the good order of this House preserved, to have legislation proceed with the conservative surroundings and protections we have always had, will vote against this proposed rule.

Mr. BLACKBURN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask the gentleman from Ohio, in the light of his long service and elaborate experience, to tell me why a majority of this House should not have the right to send to a Calendar or consider, if it please, any bill that has been introduced into the House in accordance with the rules and has remained in the committee-room for thirty days?

Mr. GARFIELD. Simply because, as I have shown, there are scores of great bills that cannot be perfected in thirty days by any committee, however industrious.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then make it sixty days.

Mr. GILLETTE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio if in his judgment this House is not worthy to be trusted to decide by a majority vote what business they will consider?

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the old conservative rule requiring two-thirds to suspend the rules so as to discharge a committee—to turn the committee with its back to the wall and tell them "you are unworthy"—is a good rule to follow; and we do not want to run in tariff legislation in this way just now—which is the purpose.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Chairman, I think that this discussion warrants the utterance I made here on Friday last, when I said the amendment was so important and far-reaching in its consequences that it should be read in print and carefully considered by every member before being voted upon.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has not enlarged upon the effect of this amendment if it should be adopted. It will work almost a revolution in the business of this House. I am perfectly content to agree that thirty days be struck out and that we insert "sixty days during a long session of Congress, and thirty days during a short session." But I do insist (and I appeal to the experience of every member on this floor to bear out the assertion) that in too many cases the sending of a bill to a committee of this House, which committee chances to be adverse to the purposes of the measure, is equivalent to consigning it to the "tomb of the Capulets." No matter what the majority of this House may want to do in such a case, it has no opportunity under the present rules to do anything. It seems to be the very essence of conservatism (if indeed this be a popular government under which the majority should have a chance to rule) to afford that majority the opportunity which this rule proposes. After a reasonable time has elapsed (whether thirty or sixty days) and a committee of this House has refused to report back for determination a measure sent to it for examination, it seems to me to be but fair and right to give, not to any one member of the House but to a majority of the House, the right to call up the bill and send it to the Calendar, or, if that majority please, to pass upon it at the instant. I do not think any danger should be apprehended from the amendment now pending.

Mr. WEAVER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] has voiced almost verbatim what I desire to say. I will submit this however. It occurs to my mind that the criticism of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] on the amendment is a criticism upon the House itself. If this House, Mr. Chairman, can be trusted on the final passage of a bill where a majority vote will pass it, certainly the judgment of the House ought to be trusted upon a question of this character. This is a popular government, or it is nothing. I hope we have not reached that stage in our history where it can be called anything else. And why it is that a bill of great public necessity and importance which has been consigned to a committee cannot be brought by a vote of a majority of this House back to the House to be considered I cannot comprehend. A two-thirds vote rarely can be obtained, and yet it might be perfectly true that a majority of the members of the House might desire to pass the measure, might desire it should become a law, but they are powerless under the two-thirds rule to pass it. It is a species of legislative legerdemain that ought to be discountenanced in this House, and I hope on the final vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky it will prevail. It would be a great stride in the direction of reform, in the direction of true and genuine popular government.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman from Iowa tell me whether he thinks a two-thirds rule is ever wise? Should we have everything by a majority?

Mr. WEAVER. Hardly ever. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Then you do not believe in having anything but by a majority all the time?

Mr. WEAVER. I will answer, in my judgment—though it may be very crude, for I certainly claim no legislative experience, certainly none as compared with that of the gentleman from Ohio—but in my judgment a majority vote ought to determine everything in this House except the expulsion of a member.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, rose.

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate is in order on this amendment.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. Have I the right to accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman who offered the amendment, at any time before it is voted on by the committee, may modify it to any extent he pleases.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. Then I accept the modification of the gentleman having charge of the report, of sixty days during the long and thirty days during the short session.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Does the Chair decide that debate is not in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not until after this amendment has been disposed of.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. There is but one amendment pending, and I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is now pending, made by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw it.

Mr. PAGE. I object to its being withdrawn.

The amendment to the amendment was not concurred in.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of correcting an impression which may follow from the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio.

This amendment is simply for the purpose of enabling the House by a majority vote to determine whether a bill shall be placed on the public Calendar or not. If the bill is not of that nature which would strike the majority of the House favorably, it would not be placed upon the public Calendar. Every bill introduced of a public nature and sent to a committee and retained there for thirty days does not necessarily go on the Calendar, but only those bills which, after lying for thirty days in committee, shall receive the approval of a majority of the House.

A word or two more and I am done. I am in favor of this amendment partly for the reason it gives opportunity here to those who by their industry and by their energy have framed bills of great benefit to the public to obtain some action by the House upon them. There are industrious men here who unfortunately are placed upon committees which really have no jurisdiction, and yet who have prepared carefully drawn bills which they desire the House to pass upon, but which are sent to one of the three or four of the important committees of the House which do monopolize the entire legislation, and there they are buried and never heard of again. My purpose is to give a fair hearing not to frivolous, not to unimportant bills but to important measures which shall receive the approval of a majority of this House. It is for that reason I advocated the amendment when it was last under consideration.

The House will remember that the only effect of the amendment is that public bills and public resolutions, not pension bills or private bills of any character, shall have an opportunity of coming before this House and the question being determined as to whether they shall go upon the Calendar or not. That is all there is in this amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. I rise to oppose the amendment. I object to it, Mr. Chairman, and I will repeat again for the benefit of the House what I have had occasion to say before, but may not have been distinctly heard, that I begin to suspect in this amendment there is "a cat in the meal-tub," and that a concealed effort is made on the question of a protective tariff. I do not want to put myself in the position of attacking protective measures in detail, as has been the custom of this House to do of late. In the last Congress there was a bill passed taking the duty off of quinine, and the duty was taken off on the ground that it would benefit the poor. I am told that the price of quinine is much larger now than when we removed that duty, and an inferior article thrown upon the market. Now, in the present session a very plausible measure was brought forward by my friend from Missouri, [Mr. HATCH,] making salt free—good enough if it did not interfere with other matters of greater moment.

There is another attack in detail upon the great protective principle in several matters which are not now developed. It is also suggested that the tariff on steel rails will be removed as the next objective point; and now, if we adopt the amendment as proposed by my friend from Kentucky, we put it in the power of the House to bring out of the committee any bill in detail that may be desired. And yet I think the protective principle is in better keeping now, in the hands of the proper committee, than it would be if the plan suggested here were adopted. Heaven knows where we might land if the plan suggested by my friend were adopted.

There are certain features of his amendment that are worthy of our sanction, that are all-proper and commendable. Reform is demanded. In the last Congress I was some ten months watching an opportunity to get before the House a supplement to the land bill I proposed. I reported that bill to the House at the commencement of this session of Congress. Three months have already expired and there is no way that I can pursue, no device that I can adopt, no strategy I can resort to, to get it before the House. I defy any member to obtain a hearing on any bill he may offer, public or private. Under this system of rules there is a worse tyranny than our people protested against in the days before the American Revolution. They fought for liberty then, and there are some of us here who might fight for liberty under these rules until we die, while the whole power of the House is locked up in the hands of the committee, or of two or three committees. They hold us in dead-lock. We are powerless in their hands. And should this be the rule of American legislation? Such it is.

While it is not my desire to force measures placed in the hands of committees out of them, and thus endanger great and important questions which affect our revenue laws, still it may be possible that we may, by permitting other great measures to be pigeon-holed, do a greater injury. In my judgment, a protective tariff is of vast moment to the prosperity of our whole country. I would rather see the tariff go to the bottom of the sea than adopt such measures as would destroy and kill other great measures which affect the entire body-politic. While I am an open and avowed protective-tariff man, I will not permit the pursuit of this idol to absorb other matters of secondary importance. It is the bane of our legislation that important measures which demand the attention of Congress should be placed in the hands of a committee every man of which might be its bitter and unrelenting enemy.

I believe that two hundred and ninety-three men are quite as capable of judging of a measure of public policy as thirteen or fifteen men. I believe further that any Representative on this floor who proposes a measure of legislation has the right to demand a test vote upon it. Let him answer to his constituents for the responsibility of the measure. The gag-law rule should have no existence in the American Congress. The amendment perplexes me. I am half inclined to support it, and yet there are reasons why I should not—a fair idea, however, as to the double text of the warp and woof of your legislation. Have we reached that time in our legislative history, Mr. Chairman, when a great measure of public policy may be locked up in committee, and when we dare not call the matter back to the House for the fear some other measure of equal interest to the country may be the subject of attack in detail and thus destroyed? A strange state of affairs, truly!

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. COX. I renew the amendment. I renew it for the purpose of saying this, that if no other man in this House interposes a protest to the speech just made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I should feel under obligation myself to make it.

Mr. WRIGHT. What is that? Say that again. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Pennsylvania talks to us about liberty, and yet he would break down the liberty of buying and selling all around our star wherever we please. He would crush out the liberty of trade and would have our farmers, who are the potential elements of the prosperity of this country, taxed to death by these infamous tariffs which put hundreds of millions into the pockets of Pennsylvania and a few men at the expense of the whole country. Ay, he would put not twenty-five millions into the Treasury, but a thousand millions into the pockets of a few favored classes. The gentleman thinks the farmer people do not study this. I know this goes beyond mere party. I remember in a contest on the tariff in 1872, when General Schenck led that side of the House, we did make an advance and reform to the amount of $40,000,000 with the aid of Senators LOGAN and ALLISON, republicans, who had the grace and pluck to fight for their western constituency.

I believe, sir, in making any modification of this rule which will take from the Committee of Ways and Means their control over tariffs.

I want tariffs sent to that committee sent back to this House for the action of a majority. When the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] sat down I was near him and I heard him say this rule was intended for reform of the tariff. I did not know that was the object of my friend from Kentucky, but the moment I found that was the object I said I would vote for it because I am in favor of free land and free trade.

For what avail
The plow or sail,
Or land or life,
If freedom fail?

Freedom to go around the world as we please with our magnificent surplus productions; freedom to buy where we please in the cheapest market, and to barter and exchange as we please. And I hail with satisfaction this effort on the part of Kentucky, which has only a little tariff on hemp, I believe, of 12 per cent.; and I hope there will be at least hemp enough to hang protection when that question is brought into this House.

What I desire now by amendment of the rules is that you may bring in your salt, that you may bring in your quinine if you please, that you may bring in your steel rails for the safety of human life, for the transportation of your produce cheaply to the seaboard, and for the extension of your agricultural productions; so that we may indeed have that privilege and freedom of trade which have belonged to the American people ever since they put forth their declaration of independence from the protection of Great Britain.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. I rise to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and to oppose the proposed addition to the rule.

Mr. Chairman, as I listen to the gentleman from New York I am almost persuaded that it would be well to abolish the tariff entirely. As I listen to others I am satisfied that the tax on whisky ought to be taken off. As I listen to others I am satisfied that the tax on tobacco might well be removed. And I come, then, in general, to the conclusion that the most economical and just way to administer this Government is to abolish the tariff and taxes and to pay the expenses from the Treasury.

But I did not rise to discuss the tariff question. I am opposed to the pending amendment. It gives the majority of the House a right after thirty days to call back from a committee any bill whatever and place it on the Calendar.

A MEMBER. Sixty days.

Mr. HAWLEY. Some one says sixty days. I do not care which it is. It is obvious under that rule, if it should be adopted, it would be entirely in order after thirty days or after sixty days to bring back every single bill which had been referred, at least every public bill, and there cannot be less than two thousand public bills now pending. And these motions are to be privileged motions. There would then be on the first Monday occurring after the expiration of thirty days two thousand privileged motions to discharge committees, each of which motions would be debatable under the rule. It would take us some time, doubtless, to call the roll two thousand times, and we should have a respectable Calendar with two thousand public bills upon it. And then with the other rule, which requires that every bill appropriating any money whatever should have the yeas and nays called upon it, I believe we should rather divide ourselves into three hundred Congresses and endeavor thereby to get through the business.

I regard the rule as mischievous and utterly impracticable. But if it is to pass I desire an opportunity to move a slight amendment. It is not in order now I believe because there is an amendment to an amendment pending, but I will seek an opportunity to offer it.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment to the amendment is a merely formal one. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] withdraw the formal amendment?

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask the attention of the gentleman from New York. Will he permit me to offer a substantial amendment by withdrawing the formal amendment which is now pending?

Mr. COX. I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. I offer the following amendment to the amendment: Insert after the word "shall" and before the words "be discharged" the words "within ten days."

So that after a majority of the House shall have ordered the measure to be returned in order to place it on the Calendar the committee having it in charge may have time to perfect it. I would have the committee not return it in an entirely crude state but would give it some days to put it in shape. If the amendment is to pass, I think what I now offer will be an improvement.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is right.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let the amendment be now reported as it will read if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to Rule XXIV the following:

When a public bill, resolution, or proposition shall have been referred to a standing or select committee of the House and no report has been made thereon for sixty days during a long session and for thirty days during a short session of Congress, it shall be in order for the member who introduced said bill, resolution, or proposition, on any Monday immediately after the expiration of the morning hour, to offer a resolution or move to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the same, which resolution or motion shall then be considered, and if decided in the affirmative, the committee shall within ten days be discharged and the bill, resolution, or proposition shall be placed on a proper calendar, unless a majority of the House shall determine then to consider the same.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire to suggest that the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. OSCAR TURNER] contemplates that the identical bill should come back before the House as it went to the committee. Now the amendment of my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] anticipates that when it gets before the standing committee that committee may amend the measure or make a substitute for it.

That would not reach what is contemplated by the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky. His proposition is to bring back the identical bill which was referred to the committee. The object of the ten days' time is to allow the committee an opportunity to amend the bill before reporting it, which would be inconsistent with the object of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. FINLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] whether his amendment enlarges the power now given under the proposed Rule XXVIII; whether what is claimed for his amendment cannot be obtained under Rule XXVIII, providing for suspensions of the rules on Monday?

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not see anything about this matter in Rule XXVIII. I will correct what I think is a misapprehension of my friend from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS.] I think the object of those who favor this proposed new rule is not so much to get back the original bill literally as to get a report upon it, for whatever the committee may report the introducer of the bill will have a right to move as a substitute for the bill reported that which he originally introduced. If the object is to get back a bill as originally introduced, then why refer it at all?

Mr. FRYE. As the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] seems to be the one perfecting this absurd proposition, I want to suggest one other point that needs perfecting. There is no provision here for an extra session. In these modern days extra sessions are quite frequent; and will not the gentleman from Connecticut provide for the extra sessions?

Mr. HAWLEY. "The gentleman from Connecticut" has already suggested a remedy; that is, that we divide ourselves into three hundred different Congresses and sit perpetually.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. HAWLEY to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question was then taken upon the amendment moved by Mr. OSCAR TURNER; and upon a division there were—ayes 78, noes 92.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. TOWNSEND, of Illinois, called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; there being 42 in the affirmative, (more than one-fifth of a quorum;) and Mr. OSCAR TURNER and Mr. FRYE were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 80, noes 108.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. I move to amend Rule XXIV by adding as a new clause what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On the first and fourth Fridays of each month, the Calendar of private bills shall be called over, (the chairman of the Committee of the Whole House commencing the call where he left off the previous Friday,) and the bills to the passage of which no objection shall then be made shall be first considered and disposed of. When a bill is again reached, after having been once objected to, the committee shall consider and dispose of the same, unless it shall again be objected to by at least five members.

Mr. WHITE. Members of the Committee of the Whole, who have listened to the reading of this proposed amendment, have discovered that it is the present existing rule of the House, known as Rule 129. By this amendment I propose to renew what we know as "objection day" upon the Fridays indicated therein. I think it is quite proper that the sense of the House shall be tested upon the propriety of retaining the original rule for the consideration of bills upon the Private Calendar.

If the proposed rules now under consideration shall be adopted by the House, all the old rules will be abrogated; and then on every recurring Friday the House will be rushed into the immediate consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, about which members may never have previously heard.

When the existing rule upon that subject was adopted, as far back as 1839, if I recall rightly the history of legislation, the aggregate number of bills introduced during a Congress was not over two hundred, and they were generally of a public character, or relating to something of general interest. We know now that our files are swollen from two hundred bills in 1839 to some six thousand or seven thousand for a term of Congress in each House. Now, if I have read rightly the record, the number of bills already pending in this House, having been introduced by its several members, is about five thousand, three-fourths of which relate entirely to private matters.

The criticism that is made against the existing rule for objection day is that it puts it in the power of one member to exercise his whim and his caprice against any particular bill by objecting to its consideration. Now, I have too high a regard for the discretion and for the fairness of individual members of this House to charge any one with being influenced by a purpose of that kind. On the contrary, an objection properly made to the immediate consideration of a private bill which proposes to appropriate a large amount of money from the Treasury gives the member and the committee and the country an opportunity to ascertain its actual merits; and if it has merits it will pass, and if it has not it will fail as it should fail.

In answer to this it is said that each of these bills before it gets on the Calendar has received the consideration of a committee of this House. Yet we very often see bills which have received the consideration of committees, and have been placed upon the Calendar upon insufficient evidence, and a judicious objection made to their consideration on objection day has enabled members to discover subsequently that a bill of an entirely fraudulent character has been imposed upon the House. I favor the old rule.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I sincerely trust that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] will not be adopted. It simply means to re-establish the present rule as it now exists, providing for what is known as "objection day." The Committee on Rules intended, and so stated in their report, to do away with objection day. I defy the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] or anybody else to assign one single reason in support of its continuance or maintenance.

What reason is there for continuing a practice which allows any bill on the Private Calendar to be passed over because of a single objection, when if by chance or luck it comes up on the next Friday it is not amenable to that objection at all? Under the proposed amendment one Friday is objection day and the next Friday is consideration day; and just by mere chance, as a bill happens to be reached on that Calendar on objection day, the interposition of a single arbitrary objection suffices to prevent its passage for the time.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I hope the gentleman will not make another speech.

Mr. WHITE. Not at all. Has not the gentleman known bad bills killed by objections?

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, sir.

Mr. WHITE. Well, I have.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I know that these bills never go to the Private Calendar unless they have been reported favorably by standing committees of the House. I take it for granted that until one of the standing committees of the House has carefully considered a bill and recommended its passage it cannot get to the Calendar. When it goes there, a prima facie case at least is made out that the bill is entitled to consideration, if not to passage. I would rather have the judgment of one of the standing committees of this House as to the merit or equity of a matter specially committed to it than to have the single unsupported opinion of any member on this floor. Besides, sir, two-thirds of the standing committees of this House report these bills which go to the Private Calendar. I say that if you intend to reinstate "objection day" you should make it apply to every Friday, and not leave it to chance or fortune whether a bill shall be reached upon an objection Friday when the objection of a single member will prevent its consideration, though if the bill had been fortunate enough to have been reached on the Friday before or the Friday after, that objection would have been powerless. The rule as it stands to-day stands without a reason to support it. There is nothing to be urged in its behalf. The Committee on Rules have proposed to strike it down, and to put every bill on the Private Calendar upon an equal footing with every other bill. That is the whole object of the amended rule as embraced in this revision.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WHITE, it was not agreed to, there being—ayes 8, noes not counted.

Mr. STEVENSON. As an amendment to Rule XXIV I submit the following, which I will state is the same proposition as that offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. OSCAR TURNER,] except that I have inserted the words "pertaining to revenue."

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to Rule XXIV the following:

When a public bill, resolution, or proposition pertaining to revenue shall have been referred to a standing or select committee of the House and no report has been made thereon for thirty days, it shall be in order for the member who introduced said bill, resolution, or proposition, on any Monday, after the call of the States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions, to offer a resolution or move to place said bill, resolution, or proposition on the proper calendar, which resolution shall then be considered; and, if decided in the affirmative, the bill, resolution, or proposition shall be placed on the Calendar, and the committee discharged from further consideration of the same.

Mr. HAYES. Is not this the same as the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky which the Committee of the Whole has already voted down?

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky related to all bills of a public nature. This amendment, as the Chair understands, is confined to bills pertaining to revenue.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have no concealments, Mr. Chairman, as to my motive in offering this amendment. I desire that this House, when a majority of its members so desire, may at any time be brought to a vote upon the tariff. Many bills have been introduced and are now pending before the Committee of Ways and Means, looking to radical reforms in the present tariff. But, sir, as we know by sad experience, these bills are doomed to "that sleep that knows no waking." Notwithstanding the burdens imposed upon the people by the iniquitous and unjust tariff legislation upon our statute-books, we find our hands tied by the rules of this House when we attempt reformation. Bills looking to a removal of these restrictions upon trade, looking to a removal of some of the burdens imposed upon the producing classes by unwise legislation, are doomed to the oblivion of the committee-room.

True, sir, a majority of this House may desire to remove the tariff from salt; may desire to place on the free list printing-paper and the chemicals used in its manufacture; may desire, as I do, that all laws of a purely protective character, laws which protect eastern manufacturers at the expense of western producers, shall be repealed. But, sir, what are the facts? As every gentleman knows, these bills are not reported. Day after day, year after year passes, and the people are still doomed to bear the burdens imposed upon them, not in the interest of the Government, but for the benefit solely of a few manufacturers. I repeat, sir, I have no desire to deprive the Government of all necessary revenue. But "where protection begins revenue ceases." Every line upon our statute-book placed there in the interest of protection is at the expense of the producing and other great industries of this country.

Mr. Chairman, at the last session of Congress, by suspension of the rules, we were enabled to pass the bill of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCKENZIE] placing quinine upon the free list. The country has realized already some of the benefits resulting from that legislation. To accomplish that reform it was necessary to suspend the rules of which we so justly complain. At the present session the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] moved the suspension of the rules and the passage of a bill removing the duty upon salt. That bill failed to pass, two-thirds failing to vote for it, notwithstanding its passage was favored by a majority of this House.

Mr. Chairman, under the present rules, if the Committee of Ways and Means are hostile to tariff reform, the majority finds itself powerless. The amendment I have proposed places it within the power of the majority of the House, under wise restrictions, to inaugurate legislation without awaiting the slow or hostile action of a committee. To this end I have offered the pending amendment. As I have said, I have no desire to conceal my purpose. Let this amendment be adopted, and there is hope for those who desire reform in our tariff legislation. I appeal, then, to every gentleman upon this floor who opposes legislation designed to benefit the few at the expense of the many, to stand by the pending amendment.

I have no hesitation, Mr. Chairman, in saying that I greatly prefer the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. OSCAR TURNER] to the one now pending. His amendment was of broader scope. I regret, and I think the majority of this House will hereafter regret, having rejected it. Under that amendment to our rules it would have been within the power of the majority, without reference to the action of committees, to inaugurate wise and salutary legislation. Under that, measures pertaining to reform in tariff and finance could be brought before this House for action. A vote could be secured in this House upon bills looking to financial reform, bills which some of us deem of importance, but which, because of the non-action of the Committee on Banking and Currency, have not been, possibly never may be, reported. There is no way to bring them before the House for action except in the manner suggested in the amendment. If a majority of the members of this House are hostile to them, well and good; but at least, sir, let us have a vote upon them.

One word more, Mr. Chairman. Under the rule proposed, it would have been possible for the majority of this House to have passed the bill equalizing the bounties of soldiers, without reference to the action which may be taken by the committee before whom that bill is now pending. In short, Mr. Chairman, that rule would have given this House at all times the control of its legislation. I trust, sir, that the amendment I have proposed, looking as it does to reform in some of the departments of legislation, may receive the sanction of this House.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STEVENSON] would work, as has been already suggested, a very great revolution in our methods of doing business. We have committees appointed for a very worthy purpose—for the careful investigation of questions of legislation. A given question may grow out of thirty or forty bills which have been introduced and referred to a committee. Take this very question of a tariff. Forty, fifty, or sixty bills may have been referred to the committee. With those bills as a basis the committee propose a harmonious and systematic revision of the tariff; with those bills the committee can make such a revision. But if this rule be adopted, then right in the midst of the investigation, when, perhaps, the committee have only half completed the work of revision, any one of these bills may be taken out of the hands of the committee, brought into the House, and put upon its passage. It seems to me that the adoption of a rule of this kind would cripple very many of the committees of the House. They would be uncertain how long a bill was to remain in their hands.

It is said here that this is a democratic government, and it is true. Mr. LOWE. No; this is an oligarchy of committees.

Mr. DUNNELL. But here in the House of Representatives we are called upon to legislate under some rules. If a majority may at any time step in and cut short in this way the deliberations of a committee we shall have wrought a great revolution.

Mr. STEVENSON. The amendment proposes to allow a committee ten days in which to perfect a bill after the resolution directing it to be reported has been adopted.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Chairman, that very concession on the part of the gentleman is an argument against the adoption of the amendment. Take, for instance, some questions which have been before the Committee of Ways and Means. Take the reduction of the tariff on steel rails. That question came before us while we were investigating the tariff upon sugar. We were unable to complete the investigation in ten days whether there should be a reduction of tariff on steel rails. One question follows another; one is linked with another; and it is impossible to get through every question in the short space of ten days.

Mr. BAYNE. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the effort of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is perfectly apparent. It is to take up our present tariff system, item by item, and to strike that system down. That is the purpose of it. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. OSCAR TURNER] had merit in it, because there doubtless are bills presented in this House entitled to consideration. There are bills withheld by committees which should come before the House for consideration, and were it not for the fact that the tariff system of the country is confronted by a party which largely favors its reduction or perhaps its extinction, I would have voted for the gentleman's amendment, because I am in favor of the freest and fairest consideration of all measures which may be proposed in this body.

But while I favor that, it must be borne in mind there exist in this country two parties. One party has constantly gone forward in the work of building up and the other of them is distinguished but for one great characteristic, and that is for tearing down. The republican party has built up the institutions of this country. The democratic party is making efforts in every direction to tear those institutions down. It wants to restrict the authority of the United States in every direction. It is desirous of doing it in the tariff system. It is desirous of doing it in reference to courts, and every effort is directed toward the grand achievement of taking away power from the Federal Government and vesting it in the States. This is one of the measures to facilitate and promote that scheme.

It is particularly pernicious when applied to the system to which the gentleman from Illinois particularly applies it, for if there be one thing which should be considered deliberately and fully by the Committee of Ways and Means it is the tariff system.

Look what we did by passing under a suspension of the rules what is called the quinine bill. We permitted quinine in its manufactured state to come in free, and yet we imposed upon many of the articles entering into the composition of quinine a duty, thus discriminating in a double sense against the people of this country and the men engaged in the production of that article. I say, sir, that any rule which will permit the party whose object is not to build up facilities for promoting such legislation on this floor is dangerous, and should not receive the support of this House.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SIMONTON. I desire to say only a word, Mr. Chairman, and will detain the committee but a moment. It appears to me the gentlemen by raising the cry that this amendment is intended to attack the tariff are about to prevent that modification of our rules which it seems to me just and fair legislation demands. When committees are formed they are the servants of the House by which it accomplishes legislation. That is their legitimate purpose; that is what they are for; and it never was intended they should turn around and be the masters of the House. They are the arms by which it works, by which it effects its purposes, and this is intended only to so curtail the power of committees, so that when they act in direct violation of the will and the wish of the majority of the House they shall be compelled to attend to that legislation which the House wants to effect. It is only under such circumstances this legislation should apply. It never was intended to grant power to obstruct the legislative will of the House.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BAYNE, by unanimous consent, withdrew the pro forma amendment.

Mr. WEAVER. I offer the following amendment:

After the word revenue insert "or finance," so it will read:

"When a public bill, resolution, or proposition appertaining to revenue or finance shall be referred to a standing or select committee," &c.

Mr. Chairman, it is a well-known fact that a majority of the members of this House were elected upon their professed devotion to the doctrine that the Government should issue the currency, and that it should not be issued by or through the banking corporations of the country. And yet it is also true that as the committees of this House are at present constituted it is absolutely impracticable, ay, it is impossible, to get a bill before this House substituting Treasury notes for national-bank currency.

I desire, sir, to offer this amendment in the spirit of fairness, and to test the sincerity of the professed soft-money men of this House. I offer it with all sincerity, and I wish to put gentlemen if not upon the record at least upon their vote on this proposition, to see if there is any substance in their profession of devotion to this doctrine, or whether it be for the mere purpose of hoodwinking the people at home that they may betray them in this House. I ask my democratic friends on my left and I ask my republican soft-money friends on my right to unite with the party of the center in this amendment now pending.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa; but I think it better to have a vote on his amendment and a separate vote on the amendment I have offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 55.

Mr. KENNA demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WEAVER and Mr. HUMPHREY were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 77, noes 71. So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question next recurred on the amendment of Mr. STEVENSON as amended.

Mr. STEVENSON. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. STEVENSON and Mr. FRYE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 101.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

MISCELLANEOUS RULES.

RULE XXV.

PRIORITY OF BUSINESS.

All questions relating to the priority of business shall be decided by a majority without debate.

RULE XXVI.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private business, unless otherwise determined by a majority of the House.

Mr. BAYNE. I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "business," in the second line of Rule XXVI, the following:

And pension bills and bills for the relief of soldiers and sailors shall have precedence until the Private Calendar shall have been cleared of them.

So that if adopted the rule will read:

"Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private business, and pension bills and bills for the relief of soldiers and sailors shall have precedence until the Private Calendar shall have been cleared of them, unless otherwise determined by a majority of the House."

Mr. BAYNE. I shall not detain the committee but a moment, as I have but a word to say in reference to this amendment. It will enable the House to take up and to dispose of pension bills and bills for the relief of soldiers without unnecessary delay. It is well known to every member of this House that it often occurs that private bills have to yield precedence to some political questions which take up the whole of the day's session, and as a necessary consequence no action can be had upon the private bills, while at the same time it is due to the members on this side of the House as well as to gentlemen upon the other side to say that there is no hesitancy whatever in acting with all reasonable dispatch upon cases where the rights of the soldiers are involved. All parties agree in their efforts for the passage of bills relating to the pensions of soldiers or for their relief, but other matters get into the House and prevent the consideration of pension bills for days and days at a time—bills which ought to be allowed to go forward to the Calendar for prompt consideration.

It will not prevent the suggestion of my colleague, the Speaker of the House, that a particular night might be set apart for the consideration of these pension bills, but this amendment, if adopted, will simply facilitate the consideration of these bills, and give the House an opportunity to get rid of them and then pass to the consideration of other matters. Without taking up any more time, I will simply say I hope the amendment will be approved by the House.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Is not this substantially the amendment which was voted down before?

The CHAIRMAN. This includes sailors as well as soldiers, which is the only difference the Chair perceives.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I will only say in this connection that I think claimants for pensions are better off now in the House than if this amendment was adopted, because on Fridays the motion to adjourn is constantly made, preventing the transaction of any business, and often, in many cases, it might be difficult to secure a quorum. I believe that pension bills can be passed through this House at any time, and that it is better for the pensioners to leave the rule as it is now.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I want to ask the gentleman whether a proposition is not now pending, which comes up on next Monday first on the list for recognition to suspend the rules, to set apart two evenings for the consideration of pension bills?

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) It is not on any list, but it is pending.

Mr. BAYNE. I would like to ask my colleague from Pennsylvania a question. Will the adoption of this amendment preclude such action as is proposed to be taken here—that is to set apart certain evenings for the consideration of pension bills?

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) If you take all the pension bills from the Private Calendar and give them two or three or four nights, if necessary, there is no occasion for this rule at all. And if I know the temper of this House we will give every night that is necessary in every session to dispose of all the pension bills before the House.

Mr. WARNER. I oppose this amendment for the reason that I think all this pension business should be taken out of the House and referred to a commission; and the chairman of the Pension Committee, as I understand, introduced a bill yesterday looking to this end, which I think will have the early consideration of the House. This House is not the place to consider such bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BAYNE.]

Mr. WILSON. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. BROWNE. I move to strike out the last line.

When this amendment was proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] I intended to give it my support. But upon the assurance of gentlemen on both sides of the House that pending pension claims shall have at least a night or two during the session, I think perhaps the amendment should not be urged. I notice, however, that when the proposition was made the other day for an evening session to consider pension bills gentlemen objected, and by calling for the yeas and nays on a motion to adjourn prevented even a vote of the House on the question. If that policy is to be pursued, then, as one feeling some interest and some sympathy with the soldiers of this country, I am disposed to vote for any rule that will give them an opportunity of being heard.

I ought to say a word to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. WARNER.] It strikes me that it is too late in the day to raise the question of consideration of private pension bills in the Congress of the United States. This Congress has been acting upon those bills constantly for fifteen years. The question has never arisen as to the impropriety of such action until it has been raised during the present session of this Congress.

These are not properly appeals from the Commissioner of Pensions. There are many cases in which the Commissioner of Pensions could not allow the claims under existing law that so strongly address themselves to the sympathy of the representatives of the people that we are willing to pass them by means of private bills. Hundreds of such cases occur, and many of them are on the Calendar of this House to-day, cases in which the Commissioner of Pensions could not, under existing law, give a pension, and yet, by reason of the peculiar circumstances of the case, it is eminently proper that this House should act upon them.

Gentlemen say it is expensive. Why, we pass two or three hundred claims of this kind, perhaps, during a Congress, and the sum appropriated or taken from the Treasury by those bills is insignificant in comparison with the $29,000,000 that are paid upon the general pension-roll in cases passed by the Department of the Interior.

More than that; the ordinary regular pension list is constantly being diminished by the death of the soldiers, and this diminution will increase from day to day and from month to month; and the cases that we substitute by the action of the Pension Committee and of this House will not increase the aggregate of the money we take out of the Treasury for the payment of these claims. But I am for giving to those who may be entitled to them the pittance they may receive under this action of the House even if it should increase the expenses of the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WEAVER. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROWNE. Certainly, if the Chair will indulge me so far.

Mr. WEAVER. Did the gentleman from Indiana not vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. OSCAR TURNER?]

Mr. BROWNE. I did.

Mr. WEAVER. Under that amendment would it not have been possible to have brought in after thirty days the bill offered by me for the relief of the soldiers, known as the soldier bill? The gentleman's professed devotion to the interests of the soldier seems to come in too late after his voting against that amendment.

Mr. BROWNE. Does the gentleman refer to the bill introduced by himself as the peculiar bill of the soldier?

Mr. WEAVER. I do.

Mr. BROWNE. Then I want to say to the gentleman, for I may not have the opportunity of putting myself on the record by my vote, that I should vote against that bill most cheerfully and I ask to be so recorded now.

Mr. WEAVER. I will ask the gentleman further, is his name not on a petition to this House wound around a corn-stalk, on which there are 828 names—General BROWNE's being one of them—in favor of the passage of that bill?

Mr. BROWNE. It is quite likely, sir.

Mr. WEAVER. It is altogether true.

Mr. BROWNE. That only proves that which the gentleman may live long enough to learn, namely, that we have more sense now than we had yesterday.

Mr. WEAVER. It proves this, that the gentleman can profess one thing at home and be another thing here in Congress.

Mr. BROWNE. The gentleman is mistaken. I do not fear the record. The gentleman will find he is mistaken.

The question being taken on Mr. BAYNE's amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "majority of the House" and insert the words "two-thirds of the members present and voting," so that, if amended, the rule will read: "Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private business, unless otherwise determined by a two-thirds vote of the members present and voting."

Mr. DUNNELL. Under these proposed rules the business of all the other days of the week but Friday cannot be dispensed with except by a two-thirds vote. I simply desire to put Friday, which we dedicate and set apart for private business, on the same footing and protected in the same way that the business of other days of the week is protected. I trust the Committee of the Whole will not object to this amendment. We devote but one day in the week to the consideration of private business, and it seems to me that that day should be protected by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman will yield me the remainder of his time—

Mr. DUNNELL. I will do so.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope this amendment will be adopted. The vast amount of private business now pending in this House is entitled to have one day in the week set apart for its consideration. At present the delay in the consideration and passage of private measures by this House is such that it amounts to an almost absolute denial of justice to all persons interested in such measures. It is well known to every member here that we have now on the Calendar of this House something like three thousand or four thousand bills of various kinds for relief to private parties.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Not on the Calendar.

Mr. SPRINGER. I mean pending before committees of the House and on the Calendar. The parties interested in these bills have no place to go to but to this House for relief. I regret that. I have introduced, and there is now pending before the Committee on the Judiciary, a constitutional amendment prohibiting this House from passing any private bill on any subject, so that if that shall become the law of the land it will force us to provide by general law for the disposition of all such cases. In my judgment that is the proper course. But while there is no general law on the subject, parties cannot obtain redress except by coming to this House. In my judgment this House is the worst tribunal in the world for the settlement of private claims, and it is injustice to the claimants as well as to the Government to force these claims to be brought here. But under the embarrassing circumstances surrounding them I think private claimants should have one day in seven for the consideration of their business.

Mr. BLACKBURN. So do I, unless the majority of the House shall determine otherwise. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. DUNNELL; and upon a division there were—ayes 68, noes 56.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will not ask for tellers, but I give notice that I will in the House call for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

No further count being called for, the amendment of Mr. DUNNELL was agreed to.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I desire to offer as an independent rule, to come in after Rule XXVI, that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Thursday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of business on the House Calendar, unless otherwise determined by a majority of the House.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I offer this as an independent rule just now, as the Speaker of the House is present, more for the purpose of obtaining his construction of the rules as they are here reported.

For instance, what opportunity for the consideration of business on the House Calendar will there be under the operation of these proposed rules? In other words, if the House is from day to day to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of appropriation bills and revenue bills, what opportunity will there be given for the consideration of bills administrative or reformatory in their character on the House Calendar?

In my opinion it will be found that unless the opportunity is given, as proposed by the independent rule which I have submitted, there never will be, under the administration of these rules, an opportunity of reaching business upon the House Calendar, so called. I propose by this independent rule simply to put the public business of the country on the same level with the private business under the rule which has just been passed.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I do not propose to give a construction to any rule until it is enacted into a rule. I suppose, however, that the manner of reaching business on the House Calendar will be within the power of the majority of the House.

Under these proposed rules, after the motion to proceed to business on the Speaker's table shall have been disposed of, the first motion in order will be a motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider, first, bills raising revenue and general appropriation bills, and then other business on the Calendar; that is, other bills appropriating money. After that has been disposed of, or if a majority of the House shall vote down the motion to proceed to the consideration of that character of business, it will then be in order to proceed to the consideration of business on the House Calendar. It will be noticed that under the proposed rules the power of the majority of the House is always paramount as to what business shall be considered, except in a few cases where a two-thirds vote is required.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Begging pardon of the committee, it is just to that point that I wish to call attention. Under these proposed rules measures which take money from the Treasury are to be first in order and to have precedence in consideration. Private bills appropriating money are to have a special day, Friday, set apart for their consideration.

Now, I desire that one day shall be set apart for the consideration of business on the House Calendar, and that that business shall be placed in such a position that if, for instance, it is desired to reform the bank laws of the country, or the judiciary laws of the country, or if we want to enter upon any reformatory or amendatory legislation whatever, we shall not be confronted with the ruling of the Speaker, properly made under these rules, that the consideration of bills appropriating money is first in order. Upon one day at least out of the legislative days of the week let those of us who are interested in the consideration of public administrative questions have the right to move to proceed to the consideration of the Calendar on which they are placed rather than to proceed to the consideration of other business. In other words, my object is to put the public business of the country on precisely the same footing as you have put private business.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Is that what the gentleman proposes by this amendment, when Rule XXIV already provides the order of business, and puts it within the power of a majority of the House at any time to go to the House Calendar, but, anterior to that, if a majority shall so determine, to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider, first, bills raising revenue, then bills appropriating money? Having gotten through with these, a majority of the House goes to the House Calendar. Now, if the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee be adopted, it will give to the House Calendar equal rights with bills raising revenue and general appropriation bills on every day of the week, besides an exclusive privilege on Thursdays. One class of public business, the most important of all public business—bills for the raising of revenue and the disbursement of public money—will be refused equal rights, or any rights at all, on Thursdays.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind gentlemen that debate is exhausted.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) It is best that we should understand this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. If the point is not made the Chair will indulge gentlemen.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I would like to refer the gentleman from Tennessee to Rule XIII, which creates the calendars. The first clause specifies exactly what shall go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union: First, bills raising revenues; second, general appropriation bills; third, bills of a public character directly or indirectly appropriating money or property. Now, the reason these bills are included in this clause is because under another rule bills raising revenue or appropriating money must receive their first consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The second clause of Rule XIII provides a "House Calendar." What bills go to that? "All bills of a public character not raising revenue nor directly or indirectly appropriating money or property." These bills need not go to the Committee of the Whole at all for consideration; they are not subject to a point of order and can be considered in the House.

These rules are not subject to the criticism made by the gentleman from Tennessee, that we have given undue advantage to private bills over public. Whenever the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is made a majority of the House, if they wish to reach the House Calendar, have only to say, "No, we will not go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider bills raising revenue or appropriating money; we want to get to the House Calendar to consider general public business." The motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union being negatived, the next motion is to consider the House Calendar, which is thus readily reached. It will be seen, therefore, that the thirteenth rule and the twenty-fourth rule are in exact harmony, one creating the Calendars, the other specifying the order of motions with reference to business on the Calendars.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. If I can have the attention of the House for a moment I propose to follow the order of proceeding under these rules. Upon Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Saturday we follow a regular order of business, which cannot be suspended except by a two-thirds vote. The first thing in order is business on the Speaker's table. The next thing (mark it) is the motion—

That the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider, first, bills raising revenue and general appropriation bills, and then other business on its Calendar; second, to proceed to the consideration of business on the House Calendar.

Now I submit that under this language the Speaker will hold that the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is first in order, and until that is disposed of the motion to proceed to business on the House Calendar cannot be entertained. Now I propose that there shall be one day of the six on which this order will be reversed; that on Thursday it shall be first in order to move to go to the House Calendar for the consideration of general measures of reformatory legislation.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says that on Thursdays he wants to reverse the order of these motions. Now, I wish to say that under the first clause of the rule there is but a single motion—to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. When in Committee of the Whole House the Chairman is to recognize, first, any member moving to consider a revenue bill; next, any member desiring to consider a general appropriation bill; thereafter, any member proposing to consider in their order the various bills that may be on the Calendar appropriating money. The House, if it wishes to reach the House Calendar directly on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, or Saturday, has but to vote down the proposition to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and the very next motion is to proceed to the consideration of business on the House Calendar.

Mr. WHITTHORNE's amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XXVII.

UNFINISHED BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

After six days from the commencement of a second or subsequent session of any Congress, all bills, resolutions, and reports, which originated in the House, and at the close of the next preceding session which remained undetermined, shall be in order for action, and all business before committees of the House at the end of one session shall be resumed at the commencement of the next session of the same Congress in the same manner as if no adjournment had taken place.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Chairman, before moving the committee rise, I wish to ask unanimous consent for the Committee on Rules to return to Rules XXIII and XXIV in order to offer thereto certain amendments which were agreed to by the committee and which would have been offered when those rules were under consideration but for the fact the clerk of that committee was necessarily absent during that day. They are not material, but they are valuable in the judgment of the committee, and I ask unanimous consent for the committee that it may return to those two rules to submit such amendments as have been unanimously agreed to.

A MEMBER. And no other amendment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, sir, and no other than those agreed to by the Committee on Rules. I will state for the information of the committee, neither one of those amendments has yet been offered or considered by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest if the amendments are now ready it will be better to let them be read.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will ask the five amendments be printed in the RECORD to-morrow morning.

Mr. CLYMER. I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman reserve the point of order on the right of the committee to go back?

Mr. CLYMER. I do. I am perfectly willing they should be printed, but I desire to see or hear them before I consent to their being offered.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I withdraw the request, and, in my own right and under instructions of the Committee on Rules, will offer them in the House.

Mr. CLYMER. The gentleman will understand I do not wish to antagonize the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I cannot understand the action of the gentleman at all. I move the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CARLISLE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the proposed revision of the rules reported from the Committee on Rules, and had come to no resolution thereon.

REPEAL OF DUTY ON MEDICINAL BARK.

Mr. MORRISON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4737) to repeal the discriminating duty on medicinal bark; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 3058) authorizing the remission or refunding of duty on an altar from Rome, Italy, for the Saint John's cathedral, of Indianapolis, Indiana; when the Speaker signed the same.

BOSTON HARBOR DEFENSE.

Mr. MORSE, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of the mayor and city council of Boston, in relation to the harbor defense for that city; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for three days.

MILITARY POSTS ON NORTHERN LAKES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to military posts on the northern lakes; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and, on motion of Mr. CONGER, ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware, (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows, viz:

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 25, 1880.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Patents relative to a deficiency in the appropriation for illustrations for the Patent Office Official Gazette for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Attorney-General, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 19th instant, a list of persons who have held appointments under the Department of Justice during the year 1879, together with the amount of compensation paid them in accordance with the law authorizing such appointments; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter of the Chief of Engineers, covering letters and reports from Major W. P. Craighill, Corps of Engineers, of examinations and surveys made in compliance with the provisions of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1879, of Nanticoke River, Delaware and Maryland; of Broad Creek, Northeast River, Tuckahoe Creek, and Cabin Creek, Maryland, and of Chincoteague Inlet, Virginia; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 16th instant, a copy of a report from Major F. Harwood, Corps of Engineers, in regard to the harbor at Grand Haven, Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented the petition of the National Temperance Society, officially signed, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry relative to the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ROLLINS presented the petition of Judge Isaac W. Smith and others, citizens of New Hampshire; the petition of A. P. Carpenter and E. Woods, attorneys at law, of Bath, New Hampshire, and the petition of J. P. Hutchison and others, citizens of Gilford, New Hampshire, praying for the removal of the United States circuit and district courts from Exeter to Concord in that State; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FERRY presented the petition of Fred. S. Goodrich and others, citizens of Alpena, Michigan, praying for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Isaac W. Ambler, of Boston, Massachusetts, praying to be allowed a pension for services rendered the Government in the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL presented a petition of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars of Montana, officially signed, representing six hundred members, praying for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EATON. I present the petition of four publishing companies of New Haven, Connecticut, the leading papers there, the Journal and Courier, the Palladium, the Register, and the New Haven Union, praying for the passage of a bill placing paper and all material used in its manufacture on the free list, and for the abolition of the tariff duties on printing-type. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN presented a petition of the Grand Division of Sons of Temperance of Western New York, officially signed, representing nineteen hundred members, praying for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. THURMAN. I present a memorial signed by S. Chamberlain, president of the Cleveland, Tuscarawas Valley and Wheeling Railroad Company, representing one hundred and fifty-seven miles of railroad; a similar memorial of J. H. Wade, president of the Valley Railway Company, representing fifty-nine miles of railroad; and a similar memorial of J. H. Wade, president of the Cincinnati, Wabash and Michigan Railroad Company, representing one hundred and fifteen miles of railroad, remonstrating against a reduction of the duty on steel rails. I move their reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN presented the petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the State of Ohio, signed by the president and secretary, representing four thousand members, praying for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WITHERS presented the petition of James K. Hazen and others, publishers, of Richmond, Virginia, praying for the passage of a bill placing pulp, soda-ash, and other chemicals used in the manufacture of paper on the free list, and reducing the duty on printing-paper used for books, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Virginia in favor of a bill devoting the proceeds of the sales of public lands to educational purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, presented the petition of the members of the North Georgia Conference of the African Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States, praying that Wilberforce University, located in Greene County, near Xenia, Ohio, may be allowed an equal portion of the unclaimed volunteer soldiers' bounty; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented the petition of W. H. Harrison and James M. Harrison, of Montezuma, Georgia, and the petition of J. C. C. Blackburn and others, publishers at Madison, Morgan County, Georgia, praying for the passage of a bill placing the materials used in the manufacture of paper on the free list; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PRYOR presented the petition of Wiley H. Brown, of Alabama, praying the refunding by Congress to him as heir of John Morgan Brown, deceased, of interest on a judgment rendered against said John Morgan Brown; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BECK presented the petition of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars of the State of Kentucky, officially signed, representing 16,500 members, praying for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WINDOM. I present the memorial of Joseph E. Smith and others, citizens of Lone Tree Lake, Minnesota, remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill No. 496, for the reason that if that bill becomes a law it will operate oppressively and unjustly upon their suffering comrades as a class, and upon the widows and dependent relatives of such as have died by reason of diseases contracted in the service of the country. They state several other reasons why they protest against the bill. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM presented the memorial of John P. Ilsley, president of the Saint Paul and Duluth Railroad Company, representing one hundred and seventy-four miles of railroad, remonstrating against a reduction of the duty on steel rails from $28 to $10 a ton, as proposed in House bill No. 3234; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WINDOM. I also present the memorial of John I. Blair, president or main stockholder in railroads in New Jersey, Iowa, Nebraska, Missouri, Dakota, and Illinois, representing 1,759 miles of railroad, remonstrating against a reduction of the duty on steel rails from $28 to $10 a ton. Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented the petition of J. H. Stanley and 139 others, citizens of Middletown, Dauphin County, Pennsylvania, formerly soldiers who served in the Union Army during the late rebellion, praying the passage of what is known as the Weaver bill; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FARLEY. Yesterday I presented a memorial from the California Legislature, in reference to a proposed treaty between France and this Government, and had it referred to the Committee on Commerce. I ask that it be withdrawn from that committee and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. EATON. I wish to say to my friend from California that the Committee on Foreign Relations has been discharged from the consideration of that matter, believing that it belongs to another department of the Government.

Mr. FARLEY. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HEREFORD, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 894) for the relief of certain employes of the United States courts for the District of Columbia, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1370) granting a pension to Washington M. Ives; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McMILLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1371) to authorize the Mississippi River Logging Company to construct and operate sheer-booms at or near Straight Slough; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, (by request,) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1372) for the relief of Philip G. Hopkins; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COKE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1373) for the relief of William Schuchardt, United States commercial agent at Piedras Negras, Mexico; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SLATER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1374) making an appropriation for the protection of Fort Stephens, and for the improvement of the mouth of the Columbia River; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PADDOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1375) for the relief of Captain A. C. Girard, assistant surgeon, and Major David H. Brotherton, United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1376) for the relief of Ella Long; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1377) granting a pension to Margaret Lee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. LOGAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 1153) to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WITHERS, it was Ordered, That the heirs of L. C. P. Cowper be allowed to withdraw his papers from the files of the Senate, by leaving copies of the same, there being an adverse report in the case.

On motion of Mr. WALLACE, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Townsend Glover, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

On motion of Mr. FARLEY, it was Ordered, That the petition in the case of Julius Martin be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

NAVY PAYMASTERS.

Mr. WALLACE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is directed to inform the Senate how many paymasters are now upon the rolls of the Navy, and how many of such the laws authorize, and how and under what circumstances Paymaster Edward Belows became dropped from the roll of such, with the record and proceedings affecting him, and how and under what circumstances he has been restored to the list of paymasters.

PORTRAIT OF CHIEF-JUSTICE MARSHALL.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of procuring for the Supreme Court of the United States an accurate portrait of the late Chief-Justice Marshall.

CONSTANTINO BRUMIDI.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the bill (S. No. 1358) to pay certain moneys to the heirs of Constantino Brumidi, which I introduced yesterday, be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The motion was agreed to.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. No. 1191) for the relief of James Monroe Heiskell, of Baltimore City, Maryland, merely to relieve him of his political disabilities. It will take but a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent to consider the bill at this time.

Mr. WITHERS. I call for the regular order, which is the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made and the Secretary will proceed with the call of the Calendar.

Mr. WITHERS. I withdraw the objection, being informed of the character of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be reported, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That James Monroe Heiskell, of Baltimore City, Maryland, be, and he is hereby, relieved from the operation of section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, being in chapter 1, title 14 of said Revised Statutes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the section of the Revised Statutes read from the operation of which it is proposed to relieve this person. The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1218. No person who has served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion, shall be appointed to any position in the Army of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to inquire, just for information, why it is that we do not take up in lieu of this special bill the bill reported by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. McDONALD] on the 8th of December last, to repeal that section of the Revised Statutes? The Judiciary Committee has considered that subject and by a majority, of which I was not one, has reported to the Senate a recommendation to repeal section 1218 of the Revised Statutes entirely, so as to readmit into the Army of the United States every person who is now obnoxious to the prohibition of that section by reason of having been engaged in making war upon the United States. Why it is that this special case is reported and pushed, after a general bill has been reported, I am not able to understand. Perhaps somebody can explain it.

Mr. McMILLAN. I should like to have the Senator from Vermont state the effect of the bill now called to the attention of the Senate, if he is familiar with it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The simple effect of it is that whereas by law now no person who was in the military service of the so-called confederacy can be appointed into the military service of the United States, the particular bill that is before us provides for the admission of James Monroe Heiskell, now I believe one of the officers of this body, notwithstanding that section. The law is to be let up as to him. How he stands upon different grounds, and why the general bill is not disposed of instead of these special ones, was what I rose to inquire.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I was instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report this bill, because we thought that, independent of the policy of entire repeal of section 1218 of the Revised Statutes, the case now presented was one of individual exigency. The individual in question, at the age of sixteen, went into Virginia, and was under age when the war ended. He had taken no oath of allegiance, and held no office, but, nevertheless, would be ineligible, by reason of military service in the South, to be nominated for any position in the Army of the United States under existing law. He has petitioned for the removal of this disability, and the committee thought proper under the circumstances to recommend to the Senate the passage of the bill removing that disability.

I cannot see why an individual case, so entirely unobjectionable, on the contrary so far as I can see advisable in every way, should not be favorably acted on by the Senate. It is not a denial of the principle, it is simply an affirmation of the principle in the instance in question.

I can only say for my own part that I do desire to speed the day when the men, the young men all over this country, and their relatives and friends, may be enabled to testify their devotion to the Government by serving in every branch of its service. We have them in the Legislature; we have them in the executive branch; we have them in the Navy and I say it is in all respects to be desired that they may be allowed as soon as possible to be enlisted in the Army and follow the flag of their country. It is for that reason that I think we should take every opportunity to encourage the youth of the country, in every section and of every shade of political opinion, by every act of Congress, whether general or special, to help make this what we all should wish it to be, a government strong in the hearts of the people.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? I understood him to say that this person went to the State of Virginia. From where?

Mr. BAYARD. I think from Maryland.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A loyal State.

Mr. BAYARD. He went at the age of sixteen, and was under age when the war ended. I hope there will be no objection to the passage of a special act to relieve him of the disability.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We are not able apparently to get any very clear statement of the special and separate ground on which this individual suspension of the statute is to rest, still preserving its principle, so far as I can understand the Senator from Delaware, except that in this special instance, instead of doing as General Lee did in Virginia, after great pain, as I am told, go with his State, and as many others felt it to be their duty, conscientiously I have no doubt, to go with their State, the particular object of the grace and favor of this bill felt it to be his duty to go against his State and away from it to fight the cause which his State was engaged in supporting.

I am not criticising the conscientiousness of the particular conviction of the young man. They say he was only sixteen. What figure does that bear? He was old enough apparently to have a will of his own, and to be able to render service to the enemies of the United States and to the enemies of his own State, by leaving his own State and the loyal side of the line (if it is proper to use the word "loyal," it has now got so unfashionable) and to go on the other side of the line and fight his own flag and the flag of his own State, borne gallantly, Mr. President, by many a regiment from that State itself.

This is the special case that the Senator from Delaware says is to affirm the principle of the law as it stands, or recognize it, and on account of special equities to suspend it for the time being. I am not able to see how that strengthens the case of this young gentleman at all.

If there is anything in what the Senator from Delaware says of hastening the day when nothing that existed on the statute-books and in the course of history during the four years from 1861 to 1865 shall remain, it does not appear to me that this is the best possible occasion and the best possible way to hasten that day. I understand perfectly well, we all do, that that day has been apparently hastening for some time, for I think it may be safely affirmed that there is no single statute that has been passed either to support the war for the preservation of the Union or to protect the liberties and the rights of the people preserved by the Union as a part of this nation, that has not been assailed within the last two or three years, and of which it cannot be truthfully said there has not been presented and pressed a measure to repeal and set aside. Every safeguard of liberty and equal rights (not hostile to the States in rebellion but having the same force and scope in every State of the Union—only the liberty and equal rights that Magna Charta defended in England) has been assailed, and it is proposed to wipe it from the statute-book. That is true; the day has been apparently hastening when every bulwark of liberty under law and secured by law in every State, so far as the Constitution of the United States would permit it to be secured, is to be swept away. Nobody can question that. Even the security of judicial rights under plain provisions of the ancient Constitution (if we are dissatisfied with the new amendments, as a good many of us are) it is proposed to wipe out, and to leave to what is called State sovereignty the lives, and the fortunes, and the safety of citizens of the United States who are endeavoring to execute the authority of the United States in those States, entirely to the State courts, and to declare that the supremacy of the State, not under the Constitution of the United States, but against the Constitution of the United States shall go so far as that her courts, and hers alone, shall have jurisdiction in matters of national concern and in cases arising under the national Constitution.

But I need not waste your time, Mr. President, in particularizing or giving a historic detail of these measures, one by one, specific and general, comprehensive and universal, in their scope, that have been inaugurated and that are intended to be put through to sweep off every security that the Constitution has before and now given to national rights of citizens of the United States. So far the day has apparently been hastening. Whether it is a day that will hasten peace and good order and fraternity, which we all so much love, is open to great question. I do not think it is; for I would give no law to any State that was lately in rebellion that I would not give to my own. I would have no discrimination in respect of rights in States. I will not ask any other State to live under a law that the people of my State cannot live under and do not like; but the people of the State of Vermont have been so misguided that they have thought the Constitution of the United States and the rights that existed under it might be protected by national authority. Other people have thought differently and have pressed measures to overcome that. Perhaps they will succeed; perhaps they will not. This is one of them; and the special reason why we do not pass bravely, or fail to pass bravely, the repeal of this section is that this young man left his loyal State and engaged in making warfare upon it; that is all.

When the proper time comes I wish to ask the yeas and nays on the third reading of this bill.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, my object in rising is not to enter into any general discussion with regard to the principle which lies beneath all the legislation to which the Senator from Vermont has referred. The reason why this bill was put in its present form as a separate bill was to avoid unnecessary discussion in regard to this peculiar case, because it is a case in which I supposed nobody would have any objection to relieving this young man from the disability under which he labors. He is the great-grandson of James Monroe, formerly President of the United States, and representing in his day, in his administration, that "era of good feeling" which I supposed prevailed in this body at the present time. His father was for many years the Surgeon-General of the United States Army and rendered most distinguished service in that capacity. The youth was born of a Virginia mother and resided in Virginia and when the war broke out Virginia was his home. He was but temporarily in the State of Maryland, and returned, as General Johnston returned, who now honors a seat in the House of Representatives, to the home of his nativity, and although but sixteen years of age, with that military ardor which had belonged to his father and which he inherited, he felt that his duty was to the State that gave him birth. At sixteen he entered the army. He was not twenty-one when the war closed. He has been since then a resident of my State, and I have watched him since he has been within its borders. He has been faithful to every duty which the Constitution or the law required of him. He has been eminently a good citizen, of the highest character, and having learned that there was an opportunity of his getting some small appointment in the Pay Department of the Army he applied to me to aid him, when I discovered this impediment to his appointment to such a place and therefore offered this bill, and I supposed that there would be no objection to relieving this young man of the disability imposed upon him by an act passed long ago when it was proper to have passed such an act.

Mr. LOGAN. May I ask the Senator what the appointment is in the Army that this young man seeks?

Mr. WHYTE. Paymaster. He is applying for an appointment as paymaster in the Pay Department, and is recommended by some of the best republicans in the United States.

Mr. President, there is nothing extraordinary about this—

Mr. LOGAN. Is there a vacancy in the corps of paymasters?

Mr. WHYTE. I do not know. Before I undertook to see whether there was a vacancy, or to see whether I could aid him, I undertook to see if it was possible to clear away the impediments which stood in the way. If they cannot be cleared away, there is an end of the case, and I do not wish to worry his friends or attempt to induce them to get such an appointment for him.

Mr. TELLER. If this bill passes, will he be appointed?

Mr. WHYTE. I do not know. He has to apply.

Mr. TELLER. Has he not applied?

Mr. WHYTE. Not yet; he has made no application yet.

Mr. TELLER. I did not know but that he had a guarantee that if this bill passed he would be appointed.

Mr. WHYTE. I do not know what the republican administration guarantees in advance. I am not sufficiently familiar to know.

Mr. TELLER. Nor I either.

Mr. WHYTE. I am not aware of any guarantee, nor am I aware of the requirements of the service. All I desire to say is that he wishes to seek an appointment under either this or some other administration. Perhaps he will have the pleasure of applying to a democratic administration next year. I hope he will. At all events we desire to clear away from him these impediments which lie in his way.

The reason why this bill was brought in in this form as a separate bill for him was because all of these disabilities have been removed by separate bills; because at the very last session I do not think there was one dissenting voice here when we relieved Dr. Powell of his disabilities—a gentleman from my State who had been in the confederate army—and allowed him to be appointed a surgeon. His disabilities were removed, and upon the recommendation of the highest medical officer of the Army he was appointed a surgeon in the Army, and is now in Texas discharging his duty with fidelity to the Government. So in regard to other political disabilities, we have removed them by special acts. Whenever there has been a general act proposed some gentlemen have risen, and, like Banquo's ghost, have marched the ghost of Jefferson Davis before the assembled legislators; and behind Jefferson Davis other men who would not be shot at have gone down whenever a bill for general amnesty is proposed. And if this bill relieved all of those gentlemen who were soldiers in the southern army from the impediment to appointment which this section produces we should have these patriotic speeches; and especially when conventions are assembling in our own States and about to present us for President of the United States we should be sure to make a patriotic speech on this subject. I trust, Mr. President, that this young man may not be put in the category of all those who were in the southern army, but that he may stand upon his own merits, and that this bill may pass.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, for the reasons which have been so well assigned by the Senator from Maryland, I gave my hearty support to this bill before the Judiciary Committee, and I am still in favor of it. But at the same time that I did so I propounded the question there that the Senator from Vermont has propounded to the Senate to-day: Why hesitate and go on doing this act of amnesty by piecemeal? I quite concur with the Senator from Vermont that it is time to repeal section 1218 and get rid of it. I think he is strictly and eminently correct in his position on that.

I propose, now, Mr. President, that we get rid of section 1218, so that Mr. Heiskell, who is a meritorious young man, may have the benefit of it, with all the others that may be under disability, or that may come under the infliction of this statute.

It is true, as the Senator from Maryland has said, that we have granted these amnesties by piecemeal; we have granted them to individuals from time to time; and he has mentioned, in particular cases, the distinguished services to the Confederate States rendered by gentlemen who now occupy responsible places in the service of the United States. This is a remnant of the statutes born and generated out of the war; and as such gentlemen hold positions all through the service of the United States I cannot see for the life of me any use in this statute any longer; and therefore, as the Senator from Kentucky who now sits to my right [Mr. BECK] has persistently and consistently, ever since he has been in the Senate, introduced and pressed a bill for this general purpose, I ask leave to offer it as an amendment to this bill in the nature of a substitute. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert what I send to the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas proposes an amendment by way of substitution, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert:

That section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, being in chapter 1, title 14, of said Revised Statutes, which provides that "no person who has served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion, shall be appointed to any position in the Army of the United States," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am very glad that the Senator from Arkansas, who is always logical and always brave, has made that motion. I had risen to make it myself in order to put this question upon its true grounds, because there is not any possible distinction in this case except one that in my judgment is highly adverse to this particular claimant for favor, and that is, that he went from a loyal State into one that had gone off on the notion of State sovereignty. He had a right to think so, of course, if he wanted to; but that is the distinction and the only one that exists; so that I hope this amendment of the Senator from Arkansas will be agreed to, and when it is agreed to then I shall ask for the yeas and nays on the third reading of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND.]

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the third reading of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EATON, (when his name was called.) On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] If he were present, I should with great pleasure vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS, (when his name was called.) Upon all political questions I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. ROLLINS.] I do not know whether this is a political question or not; and as the Senator's colleague is not present I will ask the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] if I shall or shall not vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot say whether the Senator shall or shall not vote, by any means.

Mr. HARRIS. The question, then, I will propound is, Is this a political question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it decidedly is, and one of the chief ones of the time.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I decline to vote. I would vote "yea" if at liberty so to do.

Mr. WITHERS, (when his name was called.) I am paired on all political questions with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] As this seems to be taking that complexion I decline to vote. Otherwise I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PLUMB, (after having voted in the negative.) I voted, but in forgetfulness of the fact that I was paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] on all political questions. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. LAMAR. I am requested to state that my colleague [Mr. BRUCE] is detained at home by sickness.

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 23; as follows:

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was read the third time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have now, Mr. President, this question presented upon perfectly fair ground, no exceptional or special legislation to provide for the favorites of particular men, but the broad principle. The only provision of law that this bill is intended to repeal is, and indeed that is the whole of it, that—

No person who has served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion, shall be appointed to any position in the Army of the United States.

Mr. President, by the law as it now stands, independent of this section, young men, boys, whose friends desire or who desire themselves that they shall enter the Military Academy at West Point or the Naval Academy at Annapolis, must be, I think, not over sixteen years of age; the chairman of the Military Committee can tell me if I am right.

Mr. MAXEY. Seventeen and twenty-two are the limits at the Military Academy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To enter?

Mr. MAXEY. Young men can enter at not less than seventeen nor over twenty-two.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Between seventeen and twenty-two. Take it at twenty-two then—that is older than I expected—but not less than seventeen. Any child born in 1863 would now be seventeen. Therefore nobody born since that time is excluded, because as he grows up he will arrive at that age. Any person born ten years before 1863 would have been born in 1853, eight years before the rebellion began, and twelve years before it closed; so that at the end of the rebellion there would be no living male person who could have consciously participated in the rebellion in any responsible sense or have been in its military service unless it took in boys under twelve years of age, who is now obnoxious to the statute. So Senators will see that the sole purpose and effect of this repeal is to restore to the Army of the United States, among others, the very men who deserted it to make war against the flag that they had been educated and sworn to support. That is what it comes to; and that is all I wish to say.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, with great deference to my friend, I say it comes to no such thing, and that it is a mere ghost that is flitting before his eyes when he sees any such thing. I have supposed that the people of this country have a right to the service of every able-bodied man in time of war, and that if we should get into a war again—and no country can say it will always be at peace—we should have a right to the service of the men who were lately in the confederate service; and I supposed that so long a time had elapsed and there was such a sufficient evidence of the fact besides the lapse of time to quiet the fears of anybody who is not harassed by a nervousness that never harasses me about the loyalty of the people of the South.

How can any of these men get positions in the Army of the United States? Only by nomination by the President and confirmation by the Senate. Who of them are likely to get positions? Certainly not the old men, certainly not the men who are verging on three score years and ten. Who are likely to be needed in case we should get into a war again? Not those old men; not the men alluded to by the Senator from Vermont; men who he says left our own Army and went into the confederate service. They are not at all likely to be called into the service of the United States should we again become a belligerent. No, Mr. President, but there is a large body of young men, men of military experience, men of military talent, who are as ready to fight now for the Star Spangled Banner as any man between here and Canada, and we are asked to exclude them or reject their services in order simply to put a brand upon them for which there is no political or other necessity whatever.

I am not afraid of the southern people on this question—not the least bit of it, sir. The northern people want, the best of them, a majority of them want to bury the hatreds of the war; they want peace, they want fraternity once more. That is what they want, and they do not want to reject the services of any competent and now loyal man by inquiring whether or not he did at some time or other bear a musket in the confederate service.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, reference has been made by the Senator from Arkansas to the fact that the bill which is now before the Senate is a substitute for an original bill which had been introduced by myself and urged upon all proper occasions, and sometimes, perhaps, I may add, when it was not quite proper. I desire to say one word as to my motive for so doing. I will first read the section itself:

SEC. 1218. No person who has served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion, shall be appointed to any position in the Army of the United States.

It so happened that a year or two ago a young man living in Southern Kentucky sought to apply for a place in the Army of the United States, but he had been a page in the Tennessee Legislature during the war, when he was too young to be either loyal or disloyal. That was a civil office under one of the States then in rebellion. His father was so poor that he could not educate him without making the boy work for a living, and as there was little else doing but public matters at that time he accepted the position of a page in the Legislature of Tennessee, and was therefore disqualified by law from applying even for a place in the Army of the United States; that seemed to me to be obviously wrong when I saw the vice-president of the confederacy sitting in the other end of the Capitol, when the men who occupied the highest positions during that war are here and at the other end of the Capitol, and when the sons of those gentlemen, not being compelled to accept any service either under the confederate government or under any State in rebellion, can all enter the United States Army because their fathers were able to educate them themselves, and only the poorer boys, who were obliged to work for a living and had to do whatever was required or could be obtained either under the Confederate States or under the States, were excluded—as all the higher, richer, great, and important persons were allowed to fill places of the highest honor and profit in this Government, it seemed to me the Congress of the United States was not acting justly to itself or to the people to exclude by law even the right to apply for a place in the Army from the younger, poorer men who were obliged to work at whatever they could get to do during the years of war. Hence, I thought it was a proper thing to repeal this statute and I had hoped it would be done unanimously. No law should remain for a moment on the statute-books under which such a condition of things is possible.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I should have no objection myself to the application of the principle that the Senator from Kentucky speaks of to persons like the one that he mentions from his State; but this law to-day is no greater hardship on a person who served in the confederate service than it is on one who served in the Union

Army, for if the Senator will examine the law in reference to appointments in the Army he will find that all those persons are now over the age that would allow them to be appointed in the Army. So this in itself does not act as an inhibition solely upon those parties.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Then it is useless.

Mr. LOGAN. The repeal of it is useless, certainly, because the repeal of this law you do not authorize their appointment in the service unless you appoint them as brigadier-generals or major-generals, because up to that point men rise by promotion in the Army; and appointment in the Army now cannot be made except of persons who are not over a certain age. This statute was passed, as I understand it, for the reason that the people of this country, certainly not differing from the people of other countries in that particular, concluded that persons who served in the confederate army against the Government were not as likely to be as faithful to the Government as those who were on the other side of the question.

Mr. THURMAN. May I ask my friend a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. If my friend from Illinois were President of the United States, as he may at some future time be, and we were in war, would he not call into the service southern men? As a brave soldier would he be afraid to go into battle commanding those men?

Mr. LOGAN. No, I would not be afraid to go into battle commanding any men that had volunteered on my side, while they were under my command, nor would any man who had command of soldiers.

But the point I am getting at is this: This law was passed for the purpose of making a distinction in the Army between those who preferred the Union side and those who preferred the confederate side or who were in rebellion against the Government. I think it was a proper distinction. Whether that distinction in time of war shall be wiped out or not is another consideration. We are not in war.

The repeal of this law does not strike me as being very well in this respect: We find that recently the Congress of the United States has authorized the President to appoint certain persons in the Army, that they might be placed on the retired list, who resigned at the beginning of this war in order to keep themselves out of the war. Being out of the Army for fifteen years the Congress of the United States has passed a law authorizing their appointment in the Army that they may be placed on the retired list, two of them, I believe, with the rank of colonel.

Mr. THURMAN. What cases are those?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not remember the names. One of them was a man from Oregon and the other from Maryland. Probably some of the Senators on the Military Committee may remember the names.

Mr. BURNSIDE. F. O. Wyse and Colonel Haller.

Mr. THURMAN. When were the bills passed, I should like to know?

Mr. BURNSIDE. They were passed during the last Congress.

Mr. SLATER. Allow me to say to the Senator that Colonel Haller did not resign.

Mr. LOGAN. This other colonel resigned. There is no doubt but that one resigned.

Mr. SLATER. I think he was peremptorily dismissed without a trial.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; one of them resigned. I state the fact that one of them resigned his office. I was chairman of the Military Committee for several years, and during my term in the Senate an application was made time and again to authorize the appointment of this man from Maryland to the Army that he might be placed on the retired list. While I was in the Senate it was not passed, I will not say why; but during the last Congress the bill was passed through the Senate and the other House, and he was placed on the retired list of the Army with the rank of colonel, after having resigned his commission at the commencement of the war.

I see in this repeal the very same thing re-enacted here in Congress, that men who were in the Army prior to the war may be restored, if they are to be considered on an equality (which I do not say anything about) with these other men, and certainly they ought to be on an equality with men who resigned to keep themselves out of the way of bullets. It may be said there is no reason why Congress should not authorize the President to place them in the Army that they may go on the retired list, because they are to-day above the age at which they can be appointed in the Army. There is no good ground at all for the repeal of this law, except for the placing of these men in the Army again that they may be retired, as has been done in some instances.

No, sir; if the Congress of the United States shall attempt to put back into the Army all the men, or part of them, who were dismissed on account of unfaithfulness to their country, or men who had been in the Army and resigned and went on the other side because of their want of good faith to their country, then I say we are doing a wrong not only to the Army but to the country which supports the Army. There can be no reason for this, unless it is that these men may be placed in the Army again that they may be retired and supported by the Government, because there is no other way, they being beyond the age in which they can get into the Army, except by act of Congress.

Then, sir, I say further, not out of any bitterness or feeling, that I do claim, and I claim it in this Senate Chamber in the presence of Senators whom I have a high respect for who were on the other side in the contest, that there should be a distinction made in our Army in time of peace between those who fought for the Union and those who fought to destroy it. I have always maintained it, and ever shall maintain it, not because I have any feelings of animosity against these men; no such thing. They may have been misguided; that is not the question. They were found in a certain position against the Government. Being found there, they are not entitled again to wear the uniform of this country and draw its sword in preference to the men who have always been faithful to it. In time of war, the Senator from Ohio says, would you not not allow these men to fight? "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." When war comes, we will consider the question; but in time of peace I say, without giving any opinion as to the future, I would not place men in the Army who fought for the destruction of this Government by the side of men who struggled for its existence. I would not do it, and I never will do it.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I cannot help saying a word more on this bill, though I did not intend to say a word about it originally. I cannot let the remarks of the Senator from Illinois pass without a word. The Senator would not remove this brand from these men in time of peace; but when war comes, should it come with any foreign power or a dozen foreign powers, then the Senator will be willing to say to these men, "Here, we branded you during all these many years of peace and all the while when you were perfectly loyal, and now in the hour of need, of the country we appeal to your patriotism to come out and fight for us."

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will allow me to remark that I did not say that.

Mr. THURMAN. No, but that is exactly what it comes to.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir, I beg the Senator's pardon, I said no such thing. I said it would be time to consider that question when war came, and if the Senator now wants to call me out on that question I will answer him honestly. Peace or war, had I the appointing power, I would give commissions to those men who never failed when their country called.

Mr. THURMAN. That sounds very well indeed, and we know now what the programme of the Senator is, that in time of war he would not commission one single man, however loyal, however eminent, however distinguished his military talent, if that man twenty or thirty years before had been on the confederate side. I am perfectly willing that the Senator may take that ground and stand on it.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not say that, either.

Mr. THURMAN. And, Mr. President, there was another thing that struck me as a little curious. The Senator said that the object of this bill must be to put a parcel of officers who were once in the Army of the United States and went into the confederate service upon the retired list of the Army of the United States. How, indeed, the Senator could get such an idea as that in his head passes my comprehension. Certainly it is not supported by the few instances he gave, that of Colonel Haller and that of some Maryland colonel. In respect to Colonel Haller we are told by the Senator from Oregon that he did not resign. In regard to the Maryland man, I know nothing about him; I never heard his name before; but if he did resign in order to escape exposing his person to bullets, as the Senator from Illinois said if I understood him correctly, how comes it that a republican Senate, as this Senate was a year ago, voted to put that man back into the Army of the United States on the retired list?

Mr. LOGAN. That is an astonishing thing to me.

Mr. THURMAN. It is very surprising. I cannot understand it at all.

Mr. SLATER. Allow me to state that Colonel Haller is on the active list with the rank of major.

Mr. THURMAN. I leave that matter with the explanation of the Senator from Oregon; but this other thing it strikes me as marvelous indeed. The explanation I make of it, without knowing anything of it, is that the Military Committee of the Senate, then overwhelmingly republican, the majority in the Senate then overwhelmingly republican, did not find the facts to be as the Senator from Illinois supposes. They did not find the fact that this man had been guilty of any such cowardice or any such disloyalty, or that committee would never have reported the bill to restore him to the Army and the Senate would never have passed such a bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not say the committee found the facts to be so. I only stated what I knew of the case when I was on that committee as chairman. I stated my own conclusion, and I came to that conclusion from the evidence. Others perhaps would come to a different conclusion. That was my conclusion, and it was so understood by the committee certainly as long as I was on it. I only stated that. I do not know what might have been in the man's mind when he resigned.

Mr. THURMAN. I cannot pretend to say who are the best judges of the facts, the Senator from Illinois or those who succeeded him on the Military Committee; nor can I pretend to say whether the evidence was the same before both committees; but here stands the fact upon the statement of the Senator from Illinois, if that statement be correct, that a republican committee of this body reported in favor of restoring a man to the Army of the United States, who was not only a traitor at heart but was a greater traitor because he was a coward—to put both a traitor and coward back into the Army of the United States. A republican committee of this body reported a bill for that purpose; a republican majority in this body passed it into a law! I do not believe it, Mr. President. I believe that the facts were really different, for there is not a Senator on this floor who would do such a thing as that.

Mr. TELLER. I object to any further consideration of the bill.

Mr. WHYTE. One objection will not carry it over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The objection comes too late.

Mr. TELLER. I think not under the rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is not being considered under the Anthony rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The bill is before the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I understood it was not taken up by the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was taken up by unanimous consent, and has been discussed upon its merits down to this time, and must be disposed of by some motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, in the first place I wish to say to the Senator from Ohio and to everybody else who is willing to listen to me, that I think he is greatly mistaken every time—and it is not very infrequent in such discussions as this—when he uses the word "hatred" as apparently imputed to gentlemen who differ with him in opinion.

Mr. THURMAN. Upon my word, if I used that word to-day I do not know it. I certainly did not impute it to any Senator on that side.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know the Senator did not mean personal hatred, but the idea that is continually paraded here when those of us who do not agree with gentlemen on the other side oppose or support a particular measure is that it grows out of a sentiment of animosity to many of our colleagues and their friends who, as we think, contrary to the Constitution and in violation of their duty to it, went into a rebellion. Now, I want to state, as I have stated I presume a hundred times, that any man North or South who imputes to any republican anywhere that ever I heard of any such sentiment of hatred or animosity, makes a great mistake. It is not true. We are only, when we oppose these measures, doing what we consider to be necessary for the security and good order of the whole Union, and it is not through any animosity or hatred or, as we can see it, any prejudice to these gentlemen. We have labored under the impression—undoubtedly the Senator from Ohio can convince us it is a wrong impression—that in every controversy there must be a right side and a wrong side, and the delusion that we are under is, evidently, that we were on the right side of that controversy, which prevailed, and that the consequences that flow from being on the right side are those which the Senator from Ohio desires that those who turned out to be on the wrong side shall reap, and not those who were on the right side.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. WHYTE. I move to postpone the consideration of the question which comes up after the morning hour.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland moves that the pending order, being the unfinished business, be postponed for the further consideration of this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What do you mean by "postpone?" There are only two motions, Mr. President, that I know of, one is to postpone indefinitely (to which I have not the slightest possible objection) the 5 per cent. bill; and the other is to postpone until to-morrow. If the Senator from Maryland wishes to postpone the 5 per cent. business until to-morrow, that is one thing; if he wishes to postpone it indefinitely I am very much in favor of the proposition.

Mr. McDONALD. That is the pending motion already, to indefinitely postpone. I am certainly unwilling that it shall be postponed until to-morrow. I shall not insist on calling for the regular order at this time, to the prejudice of the present bill, if it can be disposed of in a short time; but if it is to lead to extended debate, I shall object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland moves that the unfinished business be postponed.

Mr. HOAR. Is that debatable?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is a debatable motion.

Mr. WHYTE. I desire to amend the proposition, to postpone for one hour.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not in order, of course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is not in order.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to point out to the Senate that there are pending some extremely important matters before the Senate. There is the 5 per cent. question, involving very large interests and claims. Following that is the disposition of the Geneva award, which has been crowded out in several Congresses, so that it has received no disposition whatever, and which involves the compensation from money in the Treasury of loyal ship-owners whose property was destroyed by confederate cruisers. Now, the proposition is to displace, at the risk of defeating, a measure for the compensation of these loyal owners who suffered by the war for the sake of this not very practical question, so far as immediate action is concerned, of restoring men who served in the southern army and navy to places on the roll of the Army and Navy of the United States.

I trust that this measure will not be laid aside, and that this matter which is up now will not be allowed to take precedence of all the public and private business before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the Senate ready for the question on the motion of the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. HOAR. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the President please state the question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is that the pending order, being the unfinished business of the Senate, be postponed for the further consideration of the bill which has been under discussion this morning.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me that the course pursued by the majority this morning is rather unusual. They come here with a bill very innocent in its general character and appearance, and we have the statement that there are equities in the case that require our immediate attention. Then we get a motion to substitute for that bill a measure which every person must know will bring up more or less debate, when the time given them would not have been given to this bill if it had been called in the ordinary way. We are then met with a motion to postpone all other orders, the consideration of weighty matters, matters of grave importance to the country, for that which they themselves admit has no particular importance at all, for unless it is true that this young man is waiting to be appointed, or has some expectation of being appointed, it seems to me of no possible consequence whatever whether we pass upon this bill to-day or six months from now. Unless there is somebody waiting, who has been in the confederate army, to be put in the United States Army, (and we are told that there are no vacancies,) there can be no importance in immediate action. It is a mere matter of preference on our part whether it shall be done now or some other time, and matters like the Alabama claims and the 5 per cent. bill must be postponed for the consideration of this question, a question which if it had been presented in the ordinary way we all know would not have received a moment's consideration, but would have been objected to. It ought not to have been brought up in the morning hour.

Mr. CARPENTER. What do I understand to be the pending question, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland that the pending order, which is the unfinished business of the Senate, be postponed, stating his object to be to continue the consideration of the bill which has been under consideration this morning.

Mr. CARPENTER. That motion is undoubtedly in order; but I understood the Chair to state the motion to be to postpone this bill and proceed to the consideration of the bill formerly under consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair announced that that was the purpose.

Mr. CARPENTER. Not the motion, but the motive.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will require a separate motion to get up the other bill, of course.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, I beg to make a statement to correct a wrong impression which may have been created by the remarks of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] and the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] The Senator from Ohio stated that the Committee on Military Affairs of the last Congress was a republican committee. He knows as well as I know that the committee was composed of five republicans and four democrats, and that many of its meetings were ruled by the minority party. For instance, a quorum consists of five Senators, and might have been made by three democrats and two republicans, or four democrats and one republican. What were the exact conditions of that committee on the mornings that Colonel Wyse's and Colonel Haller's cases were recommended favorably I am not going to speak, because it is not proper for me to speak of what occurred in committee, and much less proper would it be for me to criticize the action of that committee.

The Senator from Illinois has chosen to say something of what the committee did when he was a member of it, and when he was in the Senate, and has said that during the time he was out the committee did a certain thing which he thought was very wrong. As to the propriety of this course I will leave it to the Senator himself and to the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I think I can state exactly what I did say.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The substance of it was that.

Mr. LOGAN. No, I said that the Senate and the House, the Congress of the United States, had passed the bill referred to within the last two years or during the last Congress. I made no reflection upon the committee whatever. I only stated that my knowledge of the case grew out of the fact that it was presented to the committee several times while I was chairman. I said nothing about what the committee did when I was chairman, or what they did when somebody else was chairman; I only stated that I knew the facts because it was presented there several times when I was the chairman.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, I have said what I have to say on that subject. Now I will say with reference to these two men, Colonel Haller was dismissed, I believe, peremptorily by the Secretary of War without any trial. If I remember aright, he was dropped from the rolls for disloyal talk at a convivial meeting one night in camp. The Military Committee, for reasons best known to its members, upon an argument presented—which I am not going to speak of here, because it would not be proper for me to do so—decided to allow the President to act as he thought proper in that case. Inasmuch as this man had been dismissed without even the formality of a court-martial, it was thought to be fair to allow his case to be opened. I must say, without reference to my own vote, that I was in command of the Army of the Potomac at the time the occurrence took place, and I did not believe Colonel Haller was a disloyal man. I do not believe to-day he was disloyal. He fought gallantly in every battle he was engaged in; but for some reason the Secretary of War took that action and I am not going to criticise it. He has gone to a higher court than we can create here, and to a better judge. I am willing to let that matter stand just where it is. Colonel Haller was placed before a board of officers, created by authority of Congress, and that board of officers made a certain recommendation to the President of the United States, and he has taken action by nominating Colonel Haller as colonel in the Army, and the Senate has confirmed that action.

Now, in reference to Colonel Wyse, he resigned from the Army because he was ordered on a duty which he could not perform, and which it is well known he could not, and he resigned. I do not mean to say how I voted in his case. The Secretary of War held his resignation for more than a year, I believe, or certainly a year, and the whole thing had passed out of consideration. Colonel Wyse thought that he was as much an officer of the Army as I was at the time; and suddenly after this long space of time had passed, his resignation was abruptly accepted. He did struggle for reinstatement, and his wife struggled to aid him, as in duty bound. The Military Committee considered the case. It thought in its best judgment that it would be well to allow the President, if he thought proper, after investigating the case, to reinstate Colonel Wyse and place him on the retired list.

That was the action of the Military Committee on these two cases. I do not mean to say that it was right; I am surely not disposed to say it was wrong. I mean to say that it is not legitimate and fair criticism to criticise the action of the committee.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, at the instance of my friend, the Senator from Indiana, who is so anxious for the consideration of the bill which he has in charge at this moment, I withdraw my proposition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is withdrawn, and the Senate proceeds to the consideration of its unfinished business, being Senate bill No. 19.

PUBLIC LAND COMMISSION.

The following message from the President of the United States was laid before the Senate:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have the honor to transmit herewith a preliminary report and a draught of a bill submitted by the public land commission, authorized by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1879. The subject of the report and of the bill accompanying it is of such importance that I respectfully commend it to the prompt and earnest consideration of Congress.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 25, 1880.

R. B. HAYES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the message and documents, when printed, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of a letter from Major J. W. Powell, a member of the public land commission, appointed under the sundry civil appropriation act of March 3 last, in which he suggests certain amendments to the preliminary report of the commission submitted by the Secretary of the Interior, thereby qualifying his approval thereof.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the same disposition be made of this communication as of the message.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY WARRANT LAND LOCATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 19) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain and certify the amount of land located with military warrants in the States described therein, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. EDMUNDS to postpone the bill indefinitely.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I suppose it is quite impossible after the tremendous excitement of the morning hour to have anybody pay attention to this 5 per cent. bill, which is only to take, to begin with, about six or seven millions out of the Treasury. That, it must be admitted, is too small an object for ordinary daily consideration.

Mr. PRYOR. I ask the Senator from Vermont to give way to me for a few minutes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I yield to the Senator from Alabama with pleasure.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I did not on Friday last avail myself of the opportunity to engage in a running debate, which would have been consequent should I have answered the indirect question asked me by the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] for the reason that that mode and manner of debate most generally, and certainly with me, leads to a departure in argument, and such as impairs the force of the presentation of the question under consideration. But though I remained silent on that occasion, I listened the best I could to the enthusiastic effort of that honorable Senator; and in reply to his remarks as to the position I then assumed in regard to the bill, that it was not to the interest of Alabama to share in the fruits of the bill should it become a law, because in that event Alabama would have to pay into the Treasury of the United States by taxation on all of its people more than this bill would bestow on the corporations of that State, with which the people were in no wise interested as share or stock holders, the honorable Senator insisting in substance, if I did not misunderstand or mistake him, that if the principles of the bill were correct it made no difference whether it was to the interest or against the interest of Alabama, the bill should pass, and that it was not and would not be an answer to the merits of the bill for the Senators from Alabama to assert the proposition that it was against the interest of their State for the bill to pass—I will say, Mr. President, in answer to these remarks of the honorable Senator, that even conceding this bill to be based upon correct principles, which we deny, it might not be prudent, politic, or safe at all times to assert or insist upon its enforcement. I admit we should never act except upon and from clear, well-defined convictions of right and correct principles, especially when we have the time, means, and opportunities to inform ourselves of the right, or know the right; for to inconsiderately enforce the right is fraught not infrequently with ill results and followed by ill consequences. While it is true that one should not oppose a measure correct in principle and for the benefit of others simply because it is against his interest, it is equally true, as in this case, if the measure is wrong in principle, or at best of doubtful right and pregnant with evil consequences, and likely will prove disastrous to the Government of the United States, and injurious correspondingly to the people of Alabama, then in such case it would not only be right and wise, but a double reason why the Senators from Alabama should oppose the bill.

Since this body adjourned on Friday last I have fallen upon an official document of an old-time man and confessed statesman, and one who lived and grew up with the Constitution and country, and understood well and fresh the meaning of the Constitution, the objects, interests, and purposes of the States and the General Government in its formation—a man who and whose views and sentiments were well and favorably known, no doubt, to the honorable Senator from Illinois, and which he, when he is refreshed, will recollect, and will, I trust, recognize to-day as correct doctrine.

I always did and do now, Mr. President, entertain the highest respect for and retain the fondest recollection of those old political sages, statesmen—not politicians—and have always been influenced by and hope to be ever under the influence of their purity, wisdom, and patriotism. And, inasmuch as the man referred to is one known to us all, and one whose wisdom and foresight was, has been, and it is to be hoped will remain a light-house to Senators seeking the harbor of governmental safety, and into which harbor they would like to enter and rest secure; and one who has patiently and carefully examined and considered a subject quite germane to the one we are now considering, and a subject, to my mind, the examination of which clearly elucidates all the questions involved in this bill and debates thereon, especially the views advanced by the Senators from Alabama, that it was against the interest of Alabama and all other States in like situation, if not all others in or out of the bill if it should become a law—and to this end I ask that the Secretary read an old-time message of that great old-time President, statesman, and soldier of these United States, Andrew Jackson. And while it is of some length, it is none the less interesting and fit, as it disposes, in my opinion, of all the questions involved in this discussion material to a correct determination of the merits of this bill, although made up on a matter differing somewhat but involving the same principles. I ask that the Secretary read the extract marked from the message of General Jackson.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

1. That one of the fundamental principles, on which the Confederation of the United States was originally based, was, that the waste lands of the West, within their limits, should be the common property of the United States.

2. That those lands were ceded to the United States by the States which claimed them, and the cessions were accepted, on the express condition that they should be disposed of for the common benefit of the States, according to their respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and for no other purpose whatsoever.

3. That, in the execution of these solemn compacts, the Congress of the United States did, under the Confederation, proceed to sell these lands, and put the avails into the common Treasury; and, under the new Constitution, did repeatedly pledge them for the payment of the public debt of the United States, by which pledge each State was expected to profit in proportion to the general charge to be made upon it for that object.

These are the first principles of this whole subject, which I think cannot be contested by any one who examines the proceedings of the revolutionary Congress, the sessions of the several States, and the acts of Congress, under the new Constitution. Keeping them deeply impressed upon the mind, let us proceed to examine how far the objects of the cessions have been completed, and see whether those compacts are not still obligatory upon the United States.

The debt, for which these lands were pledged by Congress, may be considered as paid, and they are consequently released from that lien. But that pledge formed no part of the compacts with the States, or of the conditions upon which the cessions were made. It was a contract between new parties—between the United States and their creditors. Upon payment of the debt, the compacts remain in full force, and the obligation of the United States to dispose of the lands for the common benefit is neither destroyed nor impaired. As they cannot now be executed in that mode, the only legitimate question which can arise is, in what other way are these lands to be hereafter disposed of for the common benefit of the several States, "according to their respective and usual proportion in the general charge and expenditure?" The cessions of Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia, in express terms, and all the rest impliedly, not only provide thus specifically the proportion, according to which each State shall profit by the proceeds of the land sales, but they proceed to declare that they shall be "faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever." This is the fundamental law of the land, at this moment, growing out of compacts which are older than the Constitution, and formed the corner-stone on which the Union itself was erected.

In the practice of the Government the proceeds of the public lands have not been set apart as a separate fund for the payment of the public debt, but have been, and are now, paid into the Treasury, where they constitute a part of the aggregate of revenue, upon which the Government draws, as well for its current expenditures as for payment of the public debt. In this manner they have heretofore, and do now, lessen the general charge upon the people of the several States, in the exact proportions stipulated in the compacts.

These general charges have been composed, not only of the public debt and the usual expenditures attending the civil and military administrations of the Government, but of the amounts paid to the States with which these compacts were formed; the amounts paid the Indians for their right of possession; the amounts paid for the purchase of Louisiana and Florida; and the amounts paid surveyors, registers, receivers, clerks, &c., employed in preparing for market and selling the western domain. From the origin of the land system down to the 30th of September, 1832, the amount expended for all these purposes has been about $49,701,280, and the amount received from the sales, deducting payments on account of roads, &c., about $38,386,624. The revenue arising from the public lands, therefore, has not been sufficient to meet the general charges on the Treasury, which have grown out of them, by about $11,314,656. Yet in having been applied to lessen those charges the conditions of the compacts have been thus far fulfilled, and each State has profited according to its usual proportion in the general charge and expenditure. The annual proceeds of land sales have increased and the charges have diminished, so that, at a reduced price, those lands would now defray all current charges growing out of them, and save the Treasury from further advances on their account. Their original intent and object, therefore, would be accomplished as fully as it has hitherto been by reducing the price, and hereafter, as heretofore, bringing the proceeds into the Treasury. Indeed as this is the only mode in which the objects of the original compact can be attained it may be considered, for all practical purposes, that it is one of their requirements.

The bill before me begins with an entire subversion of every one of the compacts by which the United States became possessed of their western domain, and treats the subject as if they never had existence, and as if the United States were the original and unconditional owners of all the public lands. The first section directs:

"That from and after the 31st day of December, 1832, there shall be allowed and paid to each of the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Alabama, Missouri, Mississippi, and Louisiana, over and above what each of the said States is entitled to by the terms of the compacts entered into between them respectively, upon their admission into the Union and the United States, the sum of 12½ per cent. upon the net amount of the sales of the public lands, which, subsequent to the day aforesaid, shall be made within the several limits of the said States, which said sum of 12½ per cent. shall be applied to some object or objects of internal improvements or education within the said States, under the direction of their several Legislatures."

This 12½ per cent. is to be taken out of the net proceeds of the land sales before any apportionment is made; and the same seven States which are first to receive this proportion are also to receive their due proportion of the residue, according to the ratio of general distribution.

Now, waiving all considerations of equity or policy in regard to this provision, what more need be said to demonstrate its objectionable character than that it is in direct and undisguised violation of the pledge given by Congress to the States before a single cession was made; and that it abrogates the condition upon which some of the States came into the Union; and that it sets at naught the terms of cession spread upon the face of every grant under which the title to that portion of the public land is held by the Federal Government?

In the apportionment of the remaining seven-eighths of the proceeds, this bill, in a manner equally undisguised, violates the conditions upon which the United States acquired title to the ceded lands. Abandoning altogether the ratio of distribution according to the general charge and expenditure provided by the compacts, it adopts that of the Federal representative population. Virginia and other States which ceded their lands upon the express condition that they should receive a benefit from their sales in proportion to their part of the general charge, are by the bill allowed only a portion of seven-eighths of their proceeds, and that not in the proportion of general charge and expenditure, but in the ratio of their Federal representative population.

The Constitution of the United States did not delegate to Congress the power to abrogate these compacts. On the contrary, by declaring that nothing in it "shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State," it virtually provides that these compacts, and the rights they secure, shall remain untouched by the legislative power, which shall only make all "needful rules and regulations" for carrying them into effect. All beyond this would seem to be an assumption of undelimited power.

These ancient compacts are invaluable monuments of an age of virtue, patriotism, and disinterestedness. They exhibit the price that great States, which had won liberty, were willing to pay for that Union, without which, they plainly saw, it could not be preserved. It was not for territory or State power that our revolutionary fathers took up arms—it was for individual liberty and the right of self-government. The expulsion from the continent of British armies and British powers was to them a barren conquest, if, through the collisions of the redeemed States, the individual rights for which they fought should become the prey of petty military tyrannies established at home. To avert such consequences and throw around liberty the shield of union, States whose relative strength at the time gave them a preponderating power magnanimously sacrificed domains which would have made them the rivals of empires, only stipulating that they should be disposed of for the common benefit of themselves and the other confederated States. This enlightened policy produced union, and has secured liberty. It has made our waste lands to swarm with a busy people, and added many powerful States to our confederation. As well for the fruits which these noble works of our ancestors have produced as for the devotedness in which they originated, we should hesitate before we demolish them.

But there are other principles asserted in the bill which would have impelled me to withhold my signature, had I not seen in it a violation of the compacts by which the United States acquired title to a large portion of the public lands. It reasserts the principle contained in the bill authorizing a subscription to the stock of the Maysville, Washington, Paris and Lexington Turnpike Road Company, from which I was compelled to withhold my consent, for reasons contained in my message of the 27th May, 1830, to the House of Representatives. The leading principle then asserted was that Congress possesses no constitutional power to appropriate any part of the moneys of the United States for objects of a local character within the States. That principle, I cannot be mistaken in supposing, has received the unequivocal sanction of the American people, and all subsequent reflection has but satisfied me more thoroughly that the interests of our people and the purity of our Government, if not its existence, depend on its observance. The public lands are the common property of the United States, and the moneys arising from their sales are a part of the public revenue. This bill proposes to raise from, and appropriate a portion of, this public revenue to certain States, providing expressly that it shall "be applied to objects of internal improvement or education within those States," and then proceeds to appropriate the balance to all the States, with the declaration that it shall be applied "to such purposes as the Legislatures of the said respective States shall deem proper." The former appropriation is expressly for internal improvements or education, without qualification as to the kind of improvements, and, therefore, in express violation of the principle maintained in my objections to the turnpike-road bill above referred to. The latter appropriation is more broad, and gives the money to be applied to any local purpose whatsoever. It will not be denied that, under the provisions of the bill, a portion of the money might have been applied to making the very road to which the bill of 1830 had reference, and must, of course, come within the scope of the same principle. If the money of the United States cannot be applied to local purposes through its own agents, as little can it be permitted to be thus expended through the agency of the State governments.

It has been supposed that, with all the reductions in our revenue which could be speedily effected by Congress without injury to the substantial interests of the country, there might be, for some years to come, a surplus of moneys in the Treasury, and that there was, in principle, no objection to returning them to the people by whom they were paid. As the literal accomplishment of such an object is obviously impracticable, it was thought admissible, as the nearest approximation to it, to hand them over to the State governments, the more immediate representatives of the people, to be by them applied to the benefit of those to whom they properly belonged. The principle and the object was to return to the people an unavoidable surplus of revenue which might have been paid by them, under a system which could not at once be abandoned; but even this resource, which at one time seemed to be almost the only alternative to save the General Government from grasping unlimited power over internal improvements, was suggested with doubts of its constitutionality.

But this bill assumes a new principle. Its object is not to return to the people an unavoidable surplus of revenue paid in by them, but to create a surplus for distribution among the States. It seizes the entire proceeds of one source of revenue, and sets them apart as a surplus, making it necessary to raise the money for supporting the Government and meeting the general charges from other sources. It even throws the entire land system upon the customs for its support and makes the public lands a perpetual charge upon the Treasury. It does not return to the people moneys accidentally or unavoidably paid by them to the Government by which they are not wanted; but compels the people to pay moneys into the Treasury for the mere purpose of creating a surplus for distribution to their State governments. If this principle be once admitted, it is not difficult to perceive to what consequences it may lead. Already this bill, by throwing the land system on the revenues from imports for support, virtually distributes among the States a part of those revenues. The proportion may be increased from time to time without any departure from the principle now asserted until the State governments shall derive all the funds necessary for their support from the Treasury of the United States; or, if a sufficient supply should be obtained by some States and not by others, the deficient States might complain, and, to put an end to all further difficulty, Congress, without assuming any new principle, need go but one step further and put the salaries of all the State governors, judges, and other officers, with a sufficient sum for other expenses, in their general appropriation bill.

It appears to me that a more direct road to consolidation cannot be devised. Money is power, and in that government which pays all the public officers of the States will all political power be substantially concentrated. The State governments, if governments they might be called, would lose all their independence and dignity. The economy which now distinguishes them would be converted into a profusion, limited only by the extent of the supply. Being the dependents of the General Government, and looking to its Treasury as the source of all their emoluments, the State officers, under whatever names they might pass, and by whatever forms their duties might be prescribed, would, in effect, be the mere stipendiaries and instruments of the central power.

I am quite sure that the intelligent people of our several States will be satisfied, on a little reflection, that it is neither wise nor safe to release the members of their local Legislatures from the responsibility of levying the taxes necessary to support their State governments, and vest it in Congress over most of whose members they have no control. They will not think it expedient that Congress shall be the tax-gatherer and paymaster of all their State governments, thus amalgamating all their officers into one mass of common interest and common feeling. It is too obvious that such a course would subvert our well-balanced system of government, and ultimately deprive us of the blessings now derived from our happy union.

However willing I might be that any unavoidable surplus in the Treasury should be returned to the people through their State governments, I cannot assent to the principle that a surplus may be created for the purpose of distribution. Viewing this bill as, in effect, assuming the right not only to create a surplus for that purpose, but to divide the contents of the Treasury among the States without limitation, from whatever source they may be derived, and asserting the power to raise and appropriate money for the support of every State government and institution, as well as for making every local improvement, however trivial, I cannot give it my assent.

It is difficult to perceive what advantages would accrue to the old States or the new from the system of distribution which this bill proposes, if it were otherwise unobjectionable. It requires no argument to prove that if $3,000,000 a year or any other sum shall be taken out of the Treasury by this bill for distribution, it must be replaced by the same sum collected from the people through some other means. The old States will receive annually a sum of money from the Treasury, but they will pay in a larger sum, together with the expenses of collection and distribution. It is only their proportion of seven-eighths of the proceeds of land sales which they are to receive, but they must pay their due proportion of the whole. Disguise it as we may, the bill proposes to them a dead loss in the ratio of eight to seven, in addition to expenses and other incidental losses. This assertion is not the less true because it may not at first be palpable. Their receipts will be in large sums, but their payments in small ones. The governments of the States will receive seven dollars, for which the people of the States will pay eight. The large sums received will be palpable to the senses; the small sums paid it requires thought to identify. But a little consideration will satisfy the people that the effect is the same as if seven hundred dollars were given them from the public Treasury, for which they were at the same time required to pay in taxes, direct or indirect, eight hundred.

I deceive myself greatly if the new States would find their interests promoted by such a system as this bill proposes. Their true policy consists in the rapid settling and improvement of the waste lands within their limits. As a means of hastening these events, they have long been looking to a reduction in the price of public lands upon the final payment of the national debt. The effect of the proposed system would be to prevent that reduction. It is true the bill reserves to Congress the power to reduce the price, but the effect of its details, as now arranged, would probably be forever to prevent its exercise.

With the just men who inhabit the new States, it is a sufficient reason to reject this system, that it is in violation of the fundamental laws of the Republic and its Constitution. But if it were a mere question of interest or expediency, they would still reject it. They would not sell their bright prospect of increasing wealth and growing power at such a price. They would not place a sum of money to be paid into their treasuries in competition with the settlement of their waste lands and the increase of their population. They would not consider a small or a large annual sum to be paid to their governments and immediately expended, as an equivalent for that enduring wealth which is composed of flocks and herds and cultivated farms. No temptation will allure them from that object of abiding interest, the settlement of their waste lands and the increase of a hardy race of free citizens, their glory in peace and their defense in war.

On the whole, I adhere to the opinion expressed by me in my annual message of 1832, that it is our true policy that the public lands shall cease, as soon as practicable, to be a source of revenue, except for the payment of those general charges which grow out of the acquisition of the lands, their survey, and sale. Although these expenses have not been met by the proceeds of sales heretofore, it is quite certain they will be hereafter, even after a considerable reduction in the price. By meeting in the Treasury so much of the general charge as arises from that source, they will hereafter, as they have been heretofore, be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, according to the compacts of cession. I do not doubt that it is the real interest of each and all the States in the Union, and particularly of the new States, that the price of these lands shall be reduced and graduated; and that after they have been offered for a certain number of years, the refuse remaining unsold shall be abandoned to the States, and the machinery of our land system entirely withdrawn. It cannot be supposed the compacts intended that the United States should retain forever a title to lands within the States, which are of no value; and no doubt is entertained that the general interest would be best promoted by surrendering such lands to the States.

This plan for disposing of the public lands impairs no principle, violates no compact, and deranges no system. Already has the price of those lands been reduced from $2 per acre to $1.25; and upon the will of Congress it depends whether there shall be a further reduction. While the burdens of the East are diminishing by the reduction of the duties upon imports, it seems but equal justice that the chief burden of the West should be lightened in an equal degree at least. It would be just to the old States and the new, conciliate every interest, disarm the subject of all its dangers, and add another guarantee to the perpetuity of our happy Union.

Mr. PRYOR. I will say in conclusion, Mr. President, that men may and do change, but correct principles never—and under like and similar circumstances equally well applies. I therefore leave the honorable Senator from Illinois the enviable opportunity of answering the argument and reasons of that great statesman and patriot Andrew Jackson for vetoing the bill containing the same principles in substance embraced in this bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. PRYOR,] but I must confess that I was somewhat surprised at the reading of this lengthy message if the design was by the Senator to make application of it to the principle contained in this bill. I cannot understand for the life of me what the message of Andrew Jackson in reference to the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, or in reference to the application of a portion of them to the building of a road in one of the States, has to do with this proposition. If the Senator will inform me, I shall be very much obliged to him.

Mr. PRYOR. I would say to the Senator that I think the doctrine of the message applies to the provisions embraced in this bill. I may be unfortunate in my comprehension, but in my view all the doctrines involved in this bill, together with the results that flow from it, in essence and in spirit, are treated and disposed of in that message. It may be my misfortune to appreciate differently from others the proper application of the message to the bill in hand, but it is my misfortune to so regard it.

Mr. LOGAN. I will detain the Senate but a few moments, and merely to reply to what the Senator from Alabama has said. The very question now in discussion before the Senate is as to the construction of the terms "sale of the public lands," and "net proceeds of sales of the public lands." I use the term "lands disposed of by the Government" as being a proper understanding of the compact between the States and the Government in reference to the disposition of the public lands. Andrew Jackson in the message just read, used the term precisely as I do. He said that the lands were to be disposed of for the benefit of all the States, they having been ceded by the original States to the Government on that condition, and speaking of the compacts between the General Government and the different new States, he expressly said that in good faith those compacts should be kept between the Government and the States. That is all that we have contended for. If the message of Andrew Jackson on a very different proposition proves anything in the world, it proves precisely what we claim for our States, that what was agreed by the Government with these States should be kept in good faith, in disposing of the lands as President Jackson said, and the Government in disposing of them for the benefit of all, should not dispose of them merely in payment of a debt, and then not apply to itself that part of the proceeds which they had contracted with the States should be applied for the benefit of the States. There is no principle in the message in conflict with anything that has been said here in reference to the rights of the States under the contract. In fact, on the other hand, it supports the position taken by Senators in favor of the Government maintaining and keeping the contract that it made with the several States.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I understand the pending motion to be to postpone indefinitely the bill under consideration, the object of which is to benefit the States of Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, and others named in the bill. I am in favor of the motion and I hope the bill will be indefinitely postponed. I have listened to the discussion of this question with interest and with some anxiety to do what in my judgment is right and proper to be done in this case, and after some reflection upon it I am utterly unable to see any reasons whatever that should induce us to pass the bill. The bill demands of Congress to give to the several States named, some eighteen in number, 5 per cent. upon the value of lands which have been located in these States by the soldiers who had land warrants and military scrip in their possession. It is not claimed in the bill that 5 per cent. upon the lands which have been converted into money has not been paid, but that the Government having disposed by grants to soldiers of the country of certain amounts of land, these States in which lands have been located are entitled to 5 per cent., at the valuation of $1.25 per acre, upon all the lands which have been disposed of by land warrants and military scrip.

A fair construction of the enabling acts under which this claim is made, to my mind, does not entitle these States to one cent of the value of the land thus disposed of. The terms used have a meaning which is understood by every person acquainted with the import of the terms "sales" and "net proceeds of sales." What do these terms imply? They imply that the land must have been sold, and that there must have been proceeds received at the Treasury upon such sales of the lands. Therefore to my mind it is apparent that what was contemplated by Congress at the time the enabling acts of the several States were enacted was to pay to the States a certain percentage of the money received from the sales of the public lands, and the language employed does not imply an obligation on the part of the Government to give anything to the States by reason of the lands which had been or should be located upon bounty land warrants. That is the proper legal interpretation, as I understand, of the phraseology of the laws under which this claim is made.

Apart from the interpretation of the meaning of these statutes, by the terms used, it must be presumed that Congress intended only to donate to these States 5 per cent. of the proceeds of land actually sold, because there had been a policy previously adopted by the Government of giving to the soldiers of the country certain lands in consideration for their past services, if you please, for I am not going to quibble upon the subject as to whether it was a debt owed to the soldier or not. Such had been the policy of the Government, and it must be presumed that when Congress in these enabling acts agreed to pay to the several States named in the bill 5 per cent. upon the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, they made that grant in view of the policy which was known to exist on the part of the Government that a portion of these lands might be located upon bounty land warrants. It would be a forced construction of the language and would do violence, as I think, to what was known to be the policy of the Government now to attempt to put a construction upon these acts that would embrace the lands which have thus been located upon military land warrants.

That to my mind seems clear, at least sufficiently so to control my vote upon the motion to indefinitely postpone the bill. To take any other view of the matter, knowing that the policy of the Government had been already in existence for years at the time when these enabling acts were passed, would be to presuppose that Congress with a full knowledge of what had been the policy of the Government attempted to deprive itself of the full control of the public lands which they had already agreed by that policy should go to the soldiers of the country for their services.

In my opinion there is no legal right to this 5 per cent. I have heard in this argument no equitable claim and no equitable right set up. There is no legal or equitable right, if the terms of the statutes do not give the States a right to the money which they demand under this bill. According to the construction put upon it by the gentlemen who advocate this bill it is a matter of compact, a matter of contract. They say to us it is nominated in the bond, and we are derelict in our duty, unfaithful to the pledge which the Government has made, if we withhold this 5 per cent. If it is a matter of contract, and the terms of the contract do not give it to them, there is no equitable consideration by which those States became entitled to the 5 per cent. I think the only claim that can be made is a claim upon the terms of the contract itself.

To see, however, whether there were any equitable considerations to be taken into account, we ought to look on both sides of this question. What is the proposition? To take out of the public Treasury moneys which have been placed there by the taxes drawn from the people of the whole country, not only from the people of the States named in the bill, but from the people of the States that are not included in its provisions. The proposition is now made to take from the public Treasury 5 per cent. upon the valuation of all the lands that have been located upon land warrants and by military scrip, and give it to certain particular States named in the bill. To my mind it is a demand upon the further gratuity of Government rather than a claim based upon any equitable consideration.

There has been much done for these States. They have received already 5 per cent. upon all the proceeds of the sales of the public lands within their limits which have been made for cash, as I understand. At least there is no claim in the bill that there is any deficiency due to any of the States arising from that source. They have therefore received a very considerable amount of money out of the public Treasury, a bounty which the older States of the Union never received. It was, perhaps, a wise policy on the part of the Government, for the purpose of encouraging emigration to those States, for the purpose of encouraging persons to go there and settle, that some gratuity—as I hold it was a gratuity—on the part of the Government should be given to those States, in order that they might be rapidly built up and become thrifty members of the American Union. I am not now complaining that an unwise policy was adopted toward them, and yet I think there is very much in the suggestion made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] the other day, who said that if these lands were to be regarded as a trust it was a trust for the whole people of this Government, and the question might arise whether the act which gave to these several States 5 per cent. was a constitutional act or not, whether there was at least a faithful execution of the trust that had been reposed in the General Government by the States of this Union, all of whom were interested in these public lands.

But without raising any question as to the propriety or the legality of the act, I say we ought to take into consideration what has already been done by those States when we come to consider any equitable claim which they have to 5 per cent. upon the valuation, as made in this bill, of the public lands that have been located upon bounty land warrants. Why should those States who have already been the recipients of the favor of the Government, who have had large contributions from the public Treasury, by which they have built up their railroad systems in part, by which they have established their public-school systems in part, by which they have built their highways, now come and set up a further demand upon the generosity of the Government? Why should they say that they have a further equitable claim, and demand that the Government should open the Treasury of the United States and pour out the money placed there by taxation upon the people of the whole country for the especial benefit of these particular States?

These gentlemen have doubtless educated themselves into the idea that these States are entitled to this money from the General Government, but if they will look at the matter dispassionately and calmly, and compare what has already been done for their States with what was done by the General Government for the older States, they will see at once that they have no equitable claim upon the bounty of the Government to any greater extent. The original States of this Union, who fought the battles of the revolution, who established our Government, have not been pensioners upon the public Treasury. There has been nothing done, so far as I know, for the State in which I reside by the Federal Government, in order to develop the resources of the State, to build up its railroads, or to aid any internal improvements within the State, and so I believe it is the case with most if not all the original States of the Union.

Mr. LOGAN. The Government did not own any land in the Senator's State.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is true the Government did not own any land within the limits of that State, but the Government owned the Treasury, and while she has been paying out of the public Treasury money to the new States there has been no appropriation for any purpose toward building up railroads and public schools in that State, while the States named in the bill have each received half a million acres of public domain for educational purposes alone. What appropriation of money has been made for the older States for educational purposes, except, I believe, the college land scrip given a few years ago, which was distributed equally upon the basis of population to all the States of the Union? In that the new States shared as well as the older States.

Mr. LOGAN. What lands were subject to this land scrip that was for the benefit of the older States?

Mr. SAULSBURY. It was taken out of the public domain of the country, belonging to the whole country.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator says that the older States received the benefit of a land scrip for educational purposes. Upon what lands was this scrip laid? Was it laid upon the lands of the older States, or upon the land of the new States?

Mr. SAULSBURY. It was laid upon the public domain, belonging to the whole country. The college land scrip of the State of Illinois and the land scrip of the State of Delaware were alike located upon the public domain of the country, belonging to all the States, not belonging to the State of Illinois, not belonging to the State of Delaware, but the public domain, belonging to the whole country. Every State of the Union got its pro rata share of the public domain by that donation of land scrip by Congress. I am not asking whether that was a wise act or an improper act, but Congress saw fit to issue and distribute that college land scrip, and every State of the Union received its just proportion of it. There is no complaint, I believe, upon that point, but complaint is made now and the claim is set up that because some of that land, as well as the land located upon military warrants, I suppose, was located within the limits of these States, Congress must pay 5 per cent. upon the valuation of that land to be estimated at $1.25 per acre.

I would not do injustice to these States. If they had a legal claim to this money I would cheerfully vote for the bill; I would keep the plighted faith of the Government. But at the time when these enabling acts were passed it could not have been in the contemplation of Congress that, out of the public lands which might fall to the soldiers by virtue of the land warrants, the military scrip which they already held, or which hereafter might be awarded to them for their services to the whole country, not to any particular States, these States should become the recipient of 5 per cent. upon the valuation of such lands.

There is, as I before remarked, a legal import in the terms "sales" and "net proceeds of sales" used in the enabling act. The statutes of the country abound in these phrases. The Government had already enacted laws treating of the sales of public lands. When you come to interpret the language of Congress in the enabling acts, it is but right and fair that you should see what Congress meant by the same terms in other statutes which they enacted in which the same terms are used. When you turn to the laws of the Government relating to the sales of public lands it is not difficult to understand what Congress meant. I find in the Revised Statutes, I think, what is sufficient to justify me in concluding that Congress could not have contemplated anything but the conversion of the public lands into money when they used the terms "sales" and the "net proceeds of sales" in these enabling acts. If you turn to the laws relating to the sales of public lands you will find that the public lands of the country were to be offered at public or private sale. After detailing the manner in which the public sale of lands should be made, and how the private sale of lands should be effected, they used this very significant expression:

SEC. 2336. Credit shall not be allowed for the purchase-money on the sale of any of the public lands, but every purchaser of land sold at public sale shall, on the day of purchase, make complete payment therefor.

Then the law goes on to specify how the money should be paid upon private sales of land. The very terms which are used import that there must be a money consideration paid at the very time to effect the sale of the public lands. When Congress passed these enabling acts it contemplated only that out of the money arising from these sales, or conversion into money, of the public lands, these States should receive 5 per cent., and never contemplated that lands that were to be donated to the soldiers of the country under the policy of the Government and located upon land warrants should be included in the term "sales," for the meaning of "sales" had been substantially defined in the statutes applicable to the public lands.

Mr. President, I had not intended to utter a word upon this question. I looked at it somewhat for the purpose of guiding my own vote in reference to the matter, and I have come to the conclusion upon an examination of the subject, so far as I have been able to give it an examination, that there is nothing upon which the claim now set up in this way can be properly predicated, and that the demand now made by the States is wholly without warrant of authority in anything contained in the enabling acts by which those States came into the Union, or by any legislation of Congress whatsoever.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire merely to state a single proposition to see if I may meet the argument of my friend, the Senator from Delaware. In his remarks he has stated that there was no equity in this bill and could not be any. He has insisted that the lands belonged to the nation or the Government as a common property. About that we have no dispute. He has also asserted that these lands being common property it would be unfair for the States named in the bill now to receive 5 per cent. when the older States received nothing, and not only that, but that all the States had received what was called school scrip, or college scrip, which was applied to all the States, the old and the new.

Now, I desire to state the case. The State of Delaware owned her own lands. That State received whatever moneys were received from the sale of those lands. Hence the Government had nothing to pay a percentage on, for the Government did not own the lands. That State received its part of the college scrip. The college scrip was located on the land in my State, we will say, why? Because the Government had no land in the Senator's State; the land there belonged to his own State, but it had land in the State in which I reside. That much, then, of the land was taken. We do not ask anything in reference to the college scrip, because that was a donation to the States generally to which we all consented very gladly, but lands were set apart in my State for the purposes that the Senator has mentioned, for military purposes, taking the land away from the people of the State out of which they were to get 5 per cent. for educational and other purposes. Should the Government carve out large sections of land for the purpose of paying that which it was an obligation of the Government to pay and deprive us of the 5 per cent. that it agreed in the act of admission to pay on the land sold and disposed of by it? I ask the Senator if the Government had taken all the lands for this purpose, and it had the same right to take all as to take a part of the lands in my State, and if my State had withheld taxation for five years as it did, having no revenues for the purpose of running the machinery of the State and for providing educational facilities, would he consider that transaction an honest and fair one, just and equitable on the part of the Government toward my State, when the lands in his State were owned by his own State?

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is not worth while to answer that supposition. It is not worth while to meet a case which the Senator puts which has never existed, and which possibly could not have existed. What I mean to say is that by the terms of these enabling acts the faith of the Government was never pledged to Illinois or to any other State except to pay 5 per cent. upon the proceeds of the land which was converted into money and covered into the public Treasury. The Government never did agree, and, I may be allowed to say, that it never did contemplate the payment of 5 per cent. on lands which the Government disposed of in any other manner than by sale and conversion into money. The Government never contemplated or agreed to pay to the State of Illinois or to any other State anything in consideration of the lands disposed of otherwise. By the terms of the enabling acts themselves, the only promise of the Government was that when she converted lands into money either by public or private sale, out of the net proceeds of that sale, out of money received from the conversion of the lands into money, she would, not as an obligation, but as a gratuity, to enable the State to build up her railroads and build up her highways, pay 5 per cent.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me right there, I beg his pardon; I hope he will not use the word "gratuity" as applicable to the payment of the 5 per cent. when the contract with the State was that if the State should withhold its taxation for five years then it should be entitled to 5 per cent. That was not a gratuity.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It was placed as a condition upon the admission of the State into the Union that in view of the gratuity it should withhold taxation. I hold that it was not a compact between the States. It was a condition which was attached to the enabling acts that in view of the gratuity which the Government had made to those States they were not to tax the public lands, and without that condition perhaps they would not have come into the Union at that time. That gratuity was certainly at any rate a full equivalent for all the rights which the Government required that the States should abandon. It gave them 5 per cent. upon that money. If the Senator does not like the term "gratuity" I will say that the Government gave them 5 per cent. upon that ground, and there is no cause of complaint, because they had a full equivalent for the surrender of the right to tax the public domain which was located upon these land warrants within the limits of the State for the limit of time named in the enabling acts.

When this bill was first introduced I had some doubts as to whether it was seriously contemplated that Congress should give much consideration to the bill, but when I heard the earnest, energetic speech of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. McDONALD,] usually calm, always cautious and deliberate, I became satisfied that the gentlemen representing the Western States embraced in the bill had educated themselves up to the idea that there was merit in the bill, and that there was wrong on the part of the Government in not granting their request. I do not believe that these gentlemen would press this claim without having a firm conviction resting upon their minds that it is a just claim, to which the Government ought to respond. But, looking at the bill calmly and dispassionately, without any interest from my own State, I have come to the conclusion that we can be educated to almost any idea, because I cannot believe that a calm, deliberate consideration of this subject in all its bearings can warrant the conclusion to which these gentlemen have come. It is a matter of education, talked about in their States, thought about among themselves, but that it is wholly unsupported by anything in the laws enacted by Congress I am fully convinced in my own mind.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to call attention to one point? He says that this was a gratuity from the Government to the State for withholding taxation for five years. I believe I understood the Senator correctly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator understood me to say that it was a gratuity on the part of the Government.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Let me define my position. I said that this was a gratuity on the part of the Government, and that Congress in view of the gratuity which they had voluntarily made to the States placed as a condition upon the enabling acts what is now considered as an equivalent and as a consideration by the Senator from Illinois for the grant made by Congress to the State. We only differ perhaps in terms. I regard the one as a gratuity and the other as a condition in view of that gratuity which was attached to the enabling acts, and not in the nature of a compact or agreement or stipulation in the full nature of a compact or stipulation between the Government and the State.

Mr. LOGAN. I think I understand the Senator fully. If the Government then pays the State a gratuity of 5 per cent.—using the Senator's own language—on the sales of public lands, that is on lands sold for money, (which the Senator argues is all there is in the case,) in consideration that the State withholds taxation for five years on the lands sold for money, will the Senator tell me what the Government's gratuity is to the State for the land that it withholds its taxation from, in the case which we present now, where 5 per cent. is not paid, according to his argument?

Mr. SAULSBURY. That is very easily answered.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to hear the answer.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The donation of the Government to the State of Illinois was a full equivalent for the surrender of the right of the State of Illinois to tax all the public domain within its limits. It will amount by calculation, if the Senator will make it, to more than an equivalent in dollars and cents.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon; if he puts it on that ground he is certainly in error, for the 5 per cent. paid to the States on the lands absolutely sold for money would not amount to the taxation for five years. The Senator may make the calculation for himself.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know upon what basis the public domain is estimated in Illinois—I think I derived the impression from the speech of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] I do not know anything about the accuracy of the calculation—but I understand that there has been more than $4,000,000 paid to the several States already.

Mr. LOGAN. It makes no difference how much has been paid, it is very easy to count what 5 per cent. on the sales would amount to. Taking the five years, our tax on the land would be more than 1 per cent. a year.

Mr. SAULSBURY. But remember the valuation of the public domain is placed at $1.25 an acre.

Mr. LOGAN. That makes no difference.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The taxation could not, by any possibility, amount to more than 5 per cent. on the sales.

Mr. LOGAN. It will amount to more in five years than the withholding of the taxation from lands not sold for cash, but disposed of in the way that they have been, about which we complain. Then there is nothing for withholding that taxation to be paid by the Government at all. Now, I should like to know where remuneration for that is to come from?

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator is much more familiar with the modes of taxation in the State of Illinois, and perhaps in most of the States, than I am.

Mr. LOGAN. I state as a fact that it will amount to more than 5 per cent. on the sales.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Of course, I have not entered into the calculation, but I read in the speech of the Senator from Vermont that the amount already distributed among these new States amounted to over $4,000,000.

Mr. LOGAN. Oh, that may be.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It may be more than that or less than that. I have not verified the correctness of that statement or made a calculation of my own, nor do I make the statement from any information that I have received from the Land Office; but I apprehend that the tax at the low valuation that must necessarily be placed on these public lands would not have amounted to a sum so great even in five years. However, the Senator from Illinois, who perhaps has made the calculation, may be correct in his statement. At any rate, it was not contemplated, I am sure, by Congress or by the States of the Union who came in under these enabling acts, that they were surrendering any more than an equivalent for what the Government should obtain upon the cash sales of the lands of the public domain upon which the States were to receive the 5 per cent.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, before the vote is taken to postpone the bill indefinitely I wish to state the reasons which will govern my own vote. I shall vote against the indefinite postponement of the bill, and I shall vote for it upon its passage if it can be amended in conformity with my own views of right. I shall not, however, vote for the bill because of the reasons upon which it seems to be predicated, nor the arguments that have been urged in support of it. I do not believe that there is or ever was any power in the States to tax the public domain of the United States within their limits. I do not believe that the lands donated for bounties, either as a reward for or a recognition of the military services of the citizens of the United States, can be construed into a sale. Upon what ground does this proposed power of a State to tax the public lands of the United States within her limits rest? Only upon the proposition that a State has an unlimited power of taxation over persons and property within her limits. But there is no foundation for the proposition. The power of a State to tax the persons and property within her limits is restrained and controlled by her relation to the National Government and to the other States. Surely it will not be contended by any of the gentlemen who have advocated the passage of the bill upon this ground that it is contemplated in the power of taxation given to a State to tax the public property of the State, and why? Because it is already public property; and it would be an idle act, and not subserve the purposes of the power of taxation, to tax one description of the public property to the end that the State herself might pay the tax. There must be a continuous support of the government obtained by taxes upon the productive industry and property of the country. The power of the State, therefore, to impose taxes must be construed in reference to the productive industries and property of the State, and to the end of sustaining the government and the purposes of government.

What relation does this public domain sustain, and what relation did it always sustain, to the State, particularly to the new States? What were these States for whom it is claimed now that a consideration passed from them in the surrender of this power of taxation, and what would be the practical effect and operation of the power to tax the public domain within their limits? The proposition is that the States could tax the public lands of the United States, to the end that the United States might tax the people of the State to replace the tax so paid into the national Treasury. Let us suppose that at the time this power was claimed to have been released as a consideration for this donation, or the promise to pay 5 per cent. of the sales, that the States had imposed a tax upon the immense domain of the United States within their limits, upon whom would the tax have rested? Upon the people of the State imposing it, and it would have been collected by the United States out of the people of the several States, including the States imposing the tax. It is therefore a proposition that the power of a State to tax and derive revenues for the support of her government is to be exercised by taking money out of the Treasury of the United States, and using the powers of the National Government to reimpose it in part upon the people of the State exercising this power. Such an effect was never and could never be within the purview of the powers of taxation reserved to the States when under the Federal Constitution the new States were created with their separate and reserved rights and powers, but subject to the powers, duties, and obligations of the National Government.

I say then that this power of imposing taxes upon the public lands or property of the National Government is denied by the relation which the States bear under the Constitution to the Government and which they bear to one another. It is further denied by its impracticability, because it would be an exaction upon the people of the State imposing it greater than they could bear. Let us suppose that these infant communities had been taxed by the government of the State, and the tax paid by the United States out of the tax collected from the people of all the States, how would that tax have been paid by these feeble communities who needed the power of the Federal Government to protect them against the Indians, and every new State with her people, occupants, and settlers upon the public domain has needed this protection? It would have bankrupted them and they would have been unable to pay the tax.

It appears to me that this power and this right of taxation is denied by the relation to the State of the subject of taxation, the public lands, by the origin of the title, and by the uses and trusts upon which it was held. What was this public domain of the United States which it is claimed that the States had the right to tax? It was acquired for the use of the people of the States. It was held in trust for what? That it might be used to build up new political communities and organize them into States under the powers of the Constitution of the United States, and for the great purposes of protection of life and liberty and property and the advancement of civilization which that great charter provides. These new States were built and fostered upon this public soil, this public domain. The proposition of the argument conveys the idea of a right to tax that which was the very necessity of their existence, to tax all the States for holding and appropriating the public lands for their creation into new political communities, to tax the public lands held for occupation and settlement by their citizens, and which were acquired and held by the National Government for this single purpose.

Again, if such a power had existed where is the consideration and to whose benefit does it inure? The Government sells the public lands to actual occupants and settlers. The right to tax them is claimed, and the release of that right is the alleged consideration for the contract or compact. To whom does this consideration inure? It has been said in the argument on this bill that the 5 per cent. of the proceeds of sales granted by the Government of the United States to the new States on their admission to the Union never contributed anything to the treasury of the States. It has been urged that the appropriation of the public domain by acts of sale and location of bounty warrants within the different States had only a beneficial effect to facilitate national commerce and national exchange. Sir, if we can analyze and weigh the advantages which have resulted from subduing the wild lands of the public domain and bringing them into occupation and settlement, the result of the sale of the public lands and the location of bounty warrants within the State, great as has been the advantage to the people of the United States in promoting the unity of trade and commerce, which the Constitution of the United States was designed to effect and secure, and which it did in fact secure,—if you could analyze and weigh them, it would be found that to an incalculably greater extent the people of the respective States within which these appropriations have been made have been advantaged by this policy.

Shall we be told that the State of Iowa, of Illinois, of Indiana, or the States beyond the great river which have been built up, whose very life has come from this appropriation of the public domain, have no advantage in their own boundless wealth of annual production which has come from the occupation and cultivation and from the acts of sale of the public lands of the United States? Where can the idea of a consideration be drawn from this use of the public domain when we view these communities built upon this public property of the whole United States, the dominion of the soil being transferred to them, which had theretofore been held in trust for these noble and beneficent uses? Can we allow the right to tax this public property, which is the very source of their existence, the continued appropriation and use of which was necessary for that great development of the people of these new communities and of their industries and arts and inventions and knowledge which have made them the wonder of the world, for the rapidity of their growth and the extent of their power?

I cannot perceive that in this idea there is any foundation either for a power in the State to tax the public lands the property of the United States, or any consideration inuring to the benefit of the Government of the United States in the shape of a release of that power of taxation. Neither can I see that there is any equity to be found in the idea that the appropriation of the 5 per cent. of the public lands made under the several enabling acts for purposes of trade, commerce, and internal improvement constituted a consideration for any further or future acts of appropriation by the Government. It is equally true, whether it be stated of organic and constitutional law or of mere statutory law, that the law contemplates and can never intend any vain or impossible exercise of power. I say, therefore, that neither in the Federal Constitution nor the State constitution could it ever have been intended that there was to be a power of taxation over the public property, whether of public lands or public property derived from other sources.

It is further contended in the argument in support of this bill that the donation of lands or the disposal of them for bounties comes within the term "sale," as used in the act. It is held that the fact that some service or some meritorious act moved the exercise of this power by the Government of the United States to apply the lands to the benefit of the soldiers constituted a contract and made the act a sale; but there is no foundation for that proposition in reason. It does not follow that because there is some motive of merit or of value in the recipient, the donee of a gift, that this converts the donation into a sale. Because the Government of the United States recognized the fact of military service and, either before or subsequent to the act of service, gave or promised to give bounties of land to the soldiers rendering this service, that does not constitute an act of sale. It does not follow because the Government of the United States establishes a policy of liberal beneficence as a reward and encouragement for heroism and bravery and self-sacrifice among her people that therefore such acts of appropriation become a sale of the public lands.

I affirm that the proposition is not a true one either in reason or law that a bounty, a gift, becomes a purchase or a sale because there is some ingredient of value that enters into it on the part of the donee, because there is some consideration moving it. I say further that the argument places the relation of the citizen as a soldier to his Government, the obligations which exist between the great source of authority in the State and the people of the State, upon a very low and mercenary ground when it undertakes to affirm that it is like a contract between individuals, considerations of value having passed on one side and having been received on the other as a payment for patriotic services. Public faith may be pledged, as it has been always pledged in the history of our country, to a liberal policy toward the citizen who has served in war and fought her battles; but it can never be said that a man actuated by patriotic motives in giving his life, his blood, his everything to his country does it for the poor reward of a few dollars a month and the promises of bounty land. Such ideas in my judgment have no true relation to the subject-matter. It does not follow because the public faith is pledged to the soldier to protect him, to pay him a stipulated sum, and take care of him in case of death or disability, or to appropriate public lands for his use, that there is nothing but a mere contract. I cannot perceive the propriety of the assertion that the Government, the parent of these new States, in owning a proprietary interest in the land which was appropriated to create them, was only a non-resident proprietor. I understand that this was a trust held for the great and beneficent purpose of creating new political communities, living organisms, who might contribute to the wealth, the industries, the invention, the knowledge, and the arts of the age that which is the only wealth that can be transmitted from one generation to another; and in holding this trust they had a higher and nobler and more beneficent relation to the people of these new States, to the occupants and settlers upon these lands, than that of a mere non-resident individual proprietor.

Hence, if the support of this bill is to be predicated upon the idea that there was a compact or a contract between the National Government and the new States that 5 per cent. or any other per cent. of the public domain should be appropriated to their use in consideration of their release of the right of taxation; if it is contended that every act of disposal of the public lands within the sovereign power and discretion of the Government was a sale, that every bounty, as it is termed in the law, was not a bounty nor a donation, but a payment for services performed, the bill could not receive my approval; but I find something more than that, in my opinion, which perhaps differs from that of other Senators, in the bill under consideration. I find a precedent established in the past legislation in this country, and that precedent is of an established policy which rests upon a far higher ground than a mere moneyed or valuable consideration passing from one individual to another. It rests upon far higher and more tenable grounds than the mere release of a right of taxation on the part of a State of the public lands, peopled by her own citizens, and the industries and arts then growing up in her own limits. It rests upon the precedent established of a generous policy and benefaction on the part of the older States toward the new, on the part of the stronger toward the weaker. It is a precedent which rests upon the same policy and the same foundation as that which directed the Government in the appropriation of these portions of the great public domain toward the creation of new States and new political communities.

I do not see how we can distinguish between a policy, as I have said, for the appropriation of the public domain to the building up of these new political communities and a policy, which might now be continued by a proper amendment of this bill, of a liberal appropriation of parts of this public domain and its proceeds to the necessities of the weaker and yet undeveloped States of the Union.

The original acts provided that 2 per cent. of this 5 per cent. should be applied in some cases to the construction of railroads and canals and in other cases for the education of the people of the new States. Some of these new political communities, with the assent of Congress and the National Government, provided for the application of these portions of the great public domain to the great purposes of development within the State. I claim that the policy which gave origin to these appropriations of the public lands, and which was established by them, was not susceptible of a specific and particular limit to the amount appropriated by them. Five per cent. of the sale was the amount specified in the original act, but the policy established was one for the development of these great works of improvement and for the education of the people of the State. Such undoubtedly was the policy of the earlier history of the country.

I agree entirely that the term "sales" cannot include bounties nor homestead lands, but I insist that the policy of the Government was not confined to mere technical sales. This is to be found in the fact that by express direction of Congress the Indian reservations were included within the public lands upon which the 5 per cent. was to be accounted for to the States. In further vindication of this general policy we see these various acts of appropriation of the public domain to educational purposes and for purposes of internal improvement. The results, Mr. President, of this policy were of course reciprocally beneficial both to the State and to all the States, to their industries and commerce, to the public defense in time of war, and to all the purposes for which government is instituted, and which in our Constitution were made objects for the exercise of public powers. The results have been wonderful. Look at Iowa, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, at the great States of Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska—communities rich in their industrial resources and richer still in the inestimable character of their people in their knowledge, invention, science, and arts, all having grown up within a few years past under this policy.

The question which is presented to my mind is whether the precedent established in the appropriation of these public lands to these purposes is not a wise and a just one, and whether it should not be continued. If to do what this bill proposes it be demanded that taxes should be imposed on the people of the United States and the money taken out of the Treasury of the United States to be applied to these purposes, I should oppose it. I do not believe that there is any power in the Government of the United States, as I am now advised, to tax the whole people of the United States to pay the new States for becoming States and occupying the public lands; but if this bill can be amended so that the 5 per cent. can be estimated upon the bounty lands and upon the homesteads in the States where the lands were withheld from entry and sale, and the money be applied upon the principles and for the purpose of the enabling acts upon some fair basis of distribution, I shall regard it as a beneficent one, and I see no reason why such an amendment should not be made.

I shall ask that there should be some equal and just distribution of this money. I repudiate for myself the idea that the State of Iowa has a right to $881,000, the State of Illinois to $535,000, the State of Wisconsin to $490,000, the State of Minnesota to $374,000, the State of Kansas to $270,000, the State of Michigan to $270,000, the State of Arkansas to $141,000, the State of Nebraska to $121,000, the State of Ohio to $113,000, and the State of Florida to only $29,117. Why? Because these States had the public domain so applied that they have been subject to the great hardship, as it has been claimed, of having bounty land warrants located on their fertile lands, and having them subduced, reclaimed to industry, and made the source of that vast and wonderful production which is now bringing vast amounts of gold and treasure from Europe to America. That great hardship has been imposed upon them of making them great and wonderful and powerful political and industrial communities. I can see no consideration in that for this unequal distribution of this money.

The policy which was being pursued when this 5 per cent. law was adopted was a policy of beneficence from the older to the newer, from the stronger to the weaker States. If that policy can now be adopted, and this is the only policy we can wisely stand upon, because there is no other test or standard of any public measure but the beneficence of its results and the question whether it is within the constitutional power of the Government; no other standard can be found by which we can reasonably judge of any proposition other than that of the real or the actual beneficence of its results—I say then, Mr. President, that if that policy could prevail—and that is the only part of the precedent which comes down to us—if this policy of beneficence and consideration for the weaker and the desire to build them up into great and organized political communities, to infuse the arts into them, and to make them rich in the imperishable monuments of a superior civilization and a greater progress—if that be the policy to be adopted, then I am in favor of it.

But what is the condition of the question as it now stands? Under this bill Iowa is to have nearly a million dollars; my own State only $29,000.

We have a vast multitude of people who by the events of the last few years, by a providence which neither you nor I originated or could control, have been thrown upon the unaided resources of disorganized and impoverished communities for education and for preparation for the great duties of citizenship. No mere trifling with parties can meet this great question; but it is one which must address itself to the conscience of every fair, just, and impartial man. These people are thrown upon the unaided resources of the Southern States; a tax is imposed and submitted to, far greater than the productive industries and resources of the country are able with any degree of fairness to bear, a tax which is a constant impediment to the progress of the people in the accumulation of independence or of wealth. Every motive of philanthropy, every motive which can appeal to the conscience and the judgment of men should induce us to consider this point, for all of us have borne our part in bringing to pass this great responsibility, some unwittingly and others perhaps with a keener and more correct apprehension of the results, but all of us have borne our part and upon all of us rests this responsibility.

Mr. President, if this bill can be so amended, as in my judgment it should be, and as it can be, standing upon the principle and policy which gave this 5 per cent. provision to the country, the policy of beneficence, the policy of encouragement of industry—if these amendments can prevail, and this sum can be distributed so that Iowa will not have $881,000, because she has grown to be rich and powerful and great and has the power and the means to go on in this endless race of prosperity and growth, and my own State $29,000; if an equitable rule of distribution can be made, a rule that will give to the weaker and the stronger that which is adequate to their respective necessities, I shall most cheerfully vote for the bill; but I shall do it only upon the ground of the beneficence of its results, and not upon the ground that there is a compact binding upon the Government, a compact to which its faith is pledged, for the payment of 5 per cent. of all appropriations of public lands for bounties or for military purposes to the soldiers of the Republic, a compact on the part of the Government to regard the lands so disposed of as lands sold, for which a technical moneyed consideration has passed.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate long on this subject which has been already so fully discussed, but I wish to say for myself, and for the committee of which I was the organ in making this report, that the report itself is not based on the idea that the States who are the beneficiaries of this bill were to be in any sort the recipients of any generosity on the part of the Government of the United States in its passage. We believed that the General Government was legally, fairly, and justly bound for the payment of the money which this bill called for, and in arriving at that conclusion we depended upon what we considered a fair construction of the several acts of admission themselves which bear a certain resemblance to each other, and which are perhaps as fairly expressed in the terms of the act admitting Kansas into the Union as in any other act I could recite. All of them are substantially similar to the act for the admission of Kansas, which provides:

That 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of sales of all public lands lying within said State which shall be sold by Congress after the admission of said State into the Union, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, shall be paid to said State for the purpose of making public roads and internal improvements, as the Legislature shall direct: Provided, The foregoing propositions herein offered are on the condition that said State of Kansas shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the lands of the United States, or with any regulations which Congress may find necessary for securing the title in said soil to bona fide purchasers thereof, and that no tax shall be imposed on lands belonging to the United States, and that in no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents.

Sixth. And that said State shall never tax the lands or property of the United States in that State.

That proposition was accepted by the State of Kansas as a similar proposition was accepted by all these States and made irrevocable under the terms and according to the conditions of the several acts of Congress. It became, therefore, a contract between these States and the Government of the United States, the extent and effect of which is now to be determined by the Senate.

As to the question of consideration which has been mentioned, we conceive that to have been settled by the action of the General Government for over seventy years in accounting with the several States for 5 per cent. of the cash sales. If there was an actual and valid consideration for the agreement on the part of the States as to any portion of that agreement on the part of the several States, then it certainly was equally good as to all portions of the agreement. The States agreed that in consideration of certain promises on the part of the General Government they would not tax the public lands within their respective limits. The General Government on its part agreed that if the States would remit the right to tax its lands it would give to the States 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands within the respective States, and upon the theory of the committee that promise went with and accompanied every single acre of the public lands existing within the States at the date of the several acts of admission. If it did not apply to all of them, then certainly it applied to none. The promise on the part of the General Government was just as broad, covered precisely the same ground, attached to precisely the same land that the exemption from taxation which the State obligated itself to attached to, and upon that theory this bill has been framed.

We believe, therefore, that the General Government has had an ample consideration, as it has acknowledged during the past seventy years in dealing with these States, for the promise which it made, and we believe that it is not only obligated to the States to pay as it has heretofore paid the 5 per cent. on the cash sales, but is obligated to pay that amount at least further on the entries made by land warrants.

There is back of all this another question which I will briefly allude to, and that is in regard to the entries made for homestead purposes. As a member of the committee, I believed the General Government was fairly bound to the several States to account for a fair percentage, on what basis it was not necessary to determine, of the value of lands disposed of by the General Government for other purposes than for the payment of its soldiers. That was a very large question. It was one of those questions which will undoubtedly become more and more prominent with the lapse of time, and one which the committee discussing this measure in all its phases thought it best to settle once and for all; and if that question along with the other question shall remain open for consideration, the time will undoubtedly come when these States will come forward and assert their right to this entire compensation, which they have certainly some strong ground to claim.

For the purpose, then, of settling this vexed question which is becoming one of more and more importance, to which the States are attaching more and more consideration all the time, which they were beginning systematically and by organization to press on the consideration of Congress, the committee thought it best to adopt a fair and just settlement of the matter, which should be fair to the General Government without seriously impairing the rights of the several States, or at all events giving to them enough to satisfy their reasonable demands on the General Government. For that purpose the committee adopted the proviso to the last section of the bill to the effect that the settlement, if accepted by the several States as to the 5 per cent. on the entries of land warrants, shall be held to be an estoppel upon them forever from setting up any claim on account of lands disposed of for railroad purposes, or for homestead purposes, or for any work of internal improvement within the limits of the several States. This was believed to be fair; it was not trifling with an important question, as has been stated here. It was relinquishing something that the States believed they had a legal and equitable right to, but which, for the purpose of settling a controversy of long standing, they deemed it wise to remit.

Now, Mr. President, if this should stand alone upon the equitable consideration, the claim of the States would be equally strong as if it stood upon the legal ground upon which it has been placed. The use of these land warrants enabled the United States to discharge a debt which the Government owed to its soldiers. In the debate which ensued upon the passage of the bill under the provision of which most of the land warrants were issued, it was distinctly stated that the warrant was a payment to the soldier for services to be rendered, and a payment equivalent in amount to $200 in cash; that it was giving him $200 at the close of his service instead of paying it to him in monthly payments, which would be an inducement for him to enlist. It was considered just as valid an inducement, of equal value to him, as if the General Government had said to him: "We will give you $200 in money or we will give you a bond of the Government to the amount of $200;" it was so expressed. It was further emphasized by what ensued on the passage of that bill. It was distinctly understood to be a payment of an obligation of the Government, recognized as being of a certain money value. It was to be paid out of the public lands.

What resulted? From my knowledge of what occurred in my own State, which I have no doubt was practically what occurred elsewhere, the result was, that when the pre-emption settler came to enter his lands he encountered at the land office a man with a land warrant. The settler was required to pay a dollar and a quarter an acre for his land, and in addition to that to pay the costs of entry, or in lieu of the dollar and a quarter an acre to furnish a land warrant for one hundred and sixty acres. He met there the money-lender, the land-shark, as he is called in our section of the country, with a land warrant, enticing him to buy that land warrant by saying to him, "I will submit to a discount of five or ten dollars," as the case may have been, "and more than that I will take your note secured by a mortgage on the land, and you can pay this in such a way that you do not need to distress yourself to raise this money." The consequence was that in a large majority of cases the settler bought a land warrant of the man who came there thus equipped, and used it for entering his land in place of using money, the payment of which but for these land warrants would have entitled the States to this money to be paid out of the proceeds of the sales then and there made.

Of course, when the Land Office came to enter up its accounts of sales it had no money with which to pay the States on account of the entries by land warrants. It has been the practice of the Government ever since these acts of admission have been passed in the adjustment of the accounts with the several States to take the money for the 5 per cent. out of the sales of the land itself; but of course when it came to the adjustment of the accounts as to land entered by land warrants, there was no money there to pay, just as there would be none if the Government, instead of agreeing to give the soldier a land warrant, had agreed to give a two-hundred-dollar bond. The Interior Department of course would have no money as the representative of that bond out of which to pay the 5 per cent. Consequently the means of paying the 5 per cent. to the several States did not exist and could not exist in the absence of a direct appropriation on the part of Congress for that purpose; and it is that which we are here practically seeking to do, not to make a new law, not to make a new contract, but simply to provide for the proper execution of the existing contract. The General Government, by reason of this renewed obligation, constantly renewed and constantly made, came between the settler and the General Land Office with this form of its obligations and took these obligations in place of the money, and thereby deprived the State of that just revenue which it had a right to expect from the terms and conditions of the act of admission.

But it is said that this cannot be regarded as a sale, because under the technical definition of a sale that only is a sale which is settled for or the transaction of which is closed with money. But if you look to the general definition of sale which is applied by the law-writers you will find that it is to the effect that "sale" is correlative with "purchase," and purchase is defined by Blackstone as being any means of acquisition of property other than by descent or distribution. And if you apply the technical meaning of the word "sale," which has been applied here to the actual receipt of money for an object, I venture to say that there has been no sale of the public lands of the United States down to the present time. Greenbacks are not money, according to the theory of the financial school of which the Senator from Vermont is so able an exponent. There is no money, according to that school, except simply and only gold and silver. Prior to the passage of the sub-treasury act, over forty years ago, it had been the practice of the Government, as it is now, to receive bank bills in payment of public lands. They were not money according to the technical definition of the term.

So the transaction was only a barter after all. According to that the obligation of the Government to respond to the several States by the payment of 5 per cent. on these transactions was just as illegal, and just as unjustifiable, and just as unwarranted as it would be to pay 5 per cent. on the transaction which resulted in the Government receiving a land warrant for its land.

Certainly no such technical definition as that can be allowed to interpose to prevent a complete adjustment of the relations between the parties to this compact which was enacted by the several acts of admission. The State had, according to the concession of the General Government, a right to tax these lands. It is too late to inquire whether the right existed or not, because for seventy years or longer the General Government has by its action recognized the right as existing, and has been careful to stipulate the very first thing on the part of the new States as a condition of their coming into the Union that they should not exercise this right; and it was said to them, "on condition that you do not exercise that, together with other rights which you might exercise which would embarrass us in the disposition of the public soil of the United States, we will pay to you a certain percentage"—upon what? Upon this particular public property, upon these particular public lands, on which you remit this right of yours which we have recognized from the beginning—"we will pay you a certain proportion of that which we shall receive for the disposition of these lands." If the right was not thus broad, then the exemption was not so broad.

There were other things that the States stipulated. Some of them stipulated that they would not tax the land of non-residents higher than the land of residents. All stipulated that they would not interfere with the primary disposition of the soil. These stipulations were not for the benefit of the occupants of the new States; they were for the benefit of the residents of the old States. The men who represented here the old States foresaw the great field for the capital and the enterprise and the energy and the skill of the citizens of the States which they represented, and they said, "Here, we are going to admit you into the Union; we are going to bring you in on equal terms with all the other States; but we want to preserve a field for the speculative enterprise, for the genius, and for the capital of our own people, and we will attach certain conditions to your coming in whereby we shall be made perfectly sure that those of our people who go out into these new States shall have a right to the same treatment and shall receive the same treatment at the hands of the law in regard to the public lands"—which was the most obvious form of speculation then in view—"that the people of your own States receive." That was a reservation for their own benefit.

But the Senator from Vermont says that this cannot be a sale for the reason, rather sentimentally expressed—and I have no doubt he felt it—that it is transmuting the blood of the soldier into money. Mr. President, is there any way whereby the blood of the soldier was transmuted into anything else but money? Was there any service that he was required for at the hands of the Government except by money? It is the same process precisely by which he received from the hands of the paymaster his thirteen or sixteen dollars a month, as the case might be, for the services he rendered, except that at the end of the time, in place of receiving $200 in cash bounty, he received a land warrant which was to him worth, and which was considered to be worth, and which the Government had stamped as being worth, $200, and to be received in lieu of money because the Government was not then in a condition to pay money.

But this matter is treated as one of those things which are to be divided all around, and allusion has been made here to-day to the fact that this is not a "fair divide." I can imagine how persons who have had in mind that fair divide which occurred, I believe, in 1836, whereby all the money in the United States Treasury was divided around among the several States according to population, may possibly object to this, and if I were disposed to be captious and to stand upon this as a matter that would benefit my State and be here insisting on that which was of most benefit, I should say, "Let us make a fair shake all around; cut up the money that is proposed to be got out of the Treasury into aliquot parts and let each one take his own proportion and go his own way."

According to the only division of the public money of the United States which we have ever had, the recipients of which are abundantly represented here, and according to the indications that they do not mean to pay the money back, we ought to have this divided in the same way; but this proposition does not stand upon any such principle as the principle of a division. It stands upon the principle of an obligation on the part of the General Government to these several States, and while I think I could demonstrate, if I were so inclined, that the State which I have the honor in part to represent here will not receive from the Treasury of the United States under this bill largely more than it will pay in order to make good the tax which will have to be levied for the purpose of meeting this obligation, it is not a question, it has not been a question with me or with others similarly situated, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. McDONALD] and Senators from other States whose proportion is small, whether we were getting more and paying less, or paying more and getting less. It has been simply a question of what was the fair construction of the several acts of admission, and what the Government ought to pay under them to these several States in the discharge of an obligation too long postponed.

There can be no question about a waiver; it cannot be said that these States have for too long a time slept on their rights. This has been one of those things which, so far as the States west of the Mississippi are concerned, has been a source of constant consideration. It has been matter of public notoriety that the Legislatures and governors have been constantly calling the attention of the public and of the General Government to the existence of this right, and they have insisted upon it "in season and out of season" that the Government should respond to this obligation. It has been only recently, it is true—within the last few years, as I understand—that the States, moved by a common purpose, have been able to agree, or have agreed, on the terms of a general bill which should recommend that which is fair to all. In the beginning of this discussion, when the matter first came to public attention, there was a variety of claims. The States of Ohio and Indiana, for instance, had claims on account of lands entered under peculiar laws. The States of Kansas and Nebraska, and other States west of the Mississippi River which had been settled up under the homestead law, were desirous of having the Government recognize their claims to compensation on account of those entries. In those States, also, there had been grants, and, as we believe, improvident grants, for agricultural colleges and for railroads, and we believed, and still believe, that the General Government ought to pay in fairness a percentage on those entries as well. But for the purpose of effecting a final adjustment, for the purpose of establishing a common accord upon that which to a certain extent is a common interest, for the purpose of having a final settlement with the General Government, this bill was agreed upon as a basis, perfect or imperfect as it may be, but expressing that general idea of the obligation on the part of the General Government to these States which we believe it ought promptly to respond to.

A great deal has been said about the benevolence of the General Government to these States and about the grants for railroads. My own State has many railroads built by land grants. They carry a large and constantly increasing tonnage, representing a very considerable fraction of the commerce of the United States, but of that only 15 per cent. is domestic tonnage; the rest of it is tonnage which relates to the commerce and the business and the populations and the interest of other States as well. The railroads have been built as great national highways, have been built by the capital of the Eastern States. They have ministered to the profits of capitalists in the Eastern States; they are owned there completely and solely, not one single share of the stock of one of them being held within the borders of my State. All the lands, all the bonds, all the stock, or at any rate nine-tenths, I was going to say, of all the profit has resulted to those fortunate people who by reason of the accumulations of generations have been able to build these railroads, as our people were not.

I am not saying anything about the just relations between capitalists and the people who locally have the benefit of these railroads. I say that the granting of lands to railroads, as in regard to many other of the features that have attached to the admission of States into the Union, has been for the purpose and with the design and with the effect of opening up our great western regions to the capital which has been accumulated on the seaboard, and which has sought that as an outlet for an investment rather than go abroad. The commerce of these Western States which has thus been built up has built up the great cities on the seaboard. They are built up by that which makes internal commerce and trade. Our great product of wheat and corn and oats and pork and beef, which is giving to-day the American people the supremacy in the world as the greatest producing nation, we have done our share in producing.

We look upon the proposition to improve the harbors along this coast of yours as something that we have an interest in. Because these works of internal improvement, these rivers and harbors, are not within our own limits; because we are not favored in that way, because we have a system of railroads that takes us a thousand-fold more than the States which have these water-ways to carry their commerce, we do not stop to say that we will not vote these appropriations. Ninety-nine per cent. of all the appropriations for objects of that kind are made for the States lying east of the Mississippi River; and we look on that as something which we are properly and legitimately taxed for, because it ministers to the prosperity of the whole country. The mouths of these rivers and these harbors, we know, are all ours; they belong to the whole country. They are months for the discharge of the great and increasing commerce of the West. We vote freely and fully for these objects whenever we are called upon so to do. When we come up here, and say to the General Government, "You took us into the Union on certain conditions; you exacted of us certain things which you said we never should do," we do not want to be met by the statement that we have been dealt with generously, and that while the compacts have not been lived up to, we got, perhaps, something else which was of just as much account to us. I say we have responded to the obligations we incurred; we have met fairly every obligation the General Government brought us under; we have paid our share of the taxes; we have done our part in this great work of development. We have done that in common with the other States of the Union. We have furnished them a refuge for their teeming population; their reservoirs have overflowed into our country, and it has been as much for their benefit as for ours. Now we say, simply live up to the letter, to the fair construction, to the spirit of the several acts of admission. We ask nothing more.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President—

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Vermont yield to me in order that I may make a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir; I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. HARRIS. I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Before that motion is put, I wish to say that this is the second or third time when, and I think on previous occasions upon the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, this bill has been postponed in order that we might go into executive session. It was understood and I thought agreed upon on all sides that to-day would see the conclusion of this bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I shall be very happy to see its conclusion at the earliest hour possible; but at this late hour of the day I do not think it probable that the Senator from Vermont will be likely to conclude what he desires to say upon the various questions involved. Hence I do not think it probable we shall reach a conclusion on this bill to-day. I have entered my motion, and I shall still insist on it that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. McDONALD. I hope that motion will not prevail.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not a very debatable motion, or I should like to say something myself.

Mr. McDONALD. I am aware it is not debatable; but I gave notice several days ago that I should insist upon a vote on this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 10.

Mr. HARRIS. I give it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A further count is not insisted upon.

Mr. MORRILL. Is there a quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The noes were not counted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I shall be very sorry, as there are only ten millions just now to be paid out of the Treasury, to go on in the absence of a quorum, and, therefore, to find out whether there is a quorum here, I move that the Senate do now adjourn, and on that I ask for a division merely for the purpose of seeing whether we can proceed with business.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 6, noes 30; no quorum voting.

Mr. ALLISON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 11, nays 45; as follows:

YEAS—11.
Anthony,	Call,	Morrill,	Saulsbury,
Booth,	Coke,	Platt,	Slater.
Burnside,	Farley,	Pryor,
NAYS—45.
Allison,	Garland,	Lamar,	Teller,
Bailey,	Gordon,	Logan,	Thurman,
Bayard,	Groome,	McDonald,	Vest,
Beck,	Hampton,	McMillan,	Voorhees,
Blair,	Harris,	McPherson,	Walker,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hereford,	Maxey,	Wallace,
Cockrell,	Hill of Colorado,	Morgan,	Whyte,
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Georgia,	Paddock,	Williams,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hoar,	Pendleton,	Windom.
Dawes,	Jonas,	Plumb,
Eaton,	Kernan,	Randolph,
Ferry,	Kirkwood,	Ransom,
ABSENT—20.
Baldwin,	Carpenter,	Ingalls,	Rollins,
Blaine,	Conkling,	Johnston,	Saunders,
Bruce,	Edmunds,	Jones of Florida,	Sharon,
Butler,	Grover,	Jones of Nevada,	Vance,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hamlin,	Kellogg,	Withers.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am glad to know that a quorum is present. The tax-payers will be glad to know it as well as I. I am glad also to observe the candor of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] who states, if I correctly understand him, that there has been considerable difficulty among the States who are in this pot, in adjusting what kind of a bill would be agreeable to them all, and that they have at last managed to come to a common understanding to unite their forces for this just raid, as he considers it, upon the Treasury. Old-fashioned people would call that log-rolling, but of course now it is patriotism. So much for that.

The tax provision, which has been the great burden of the arguments that have been addressed to us, by which the incoming States were to renounce their right to taxation for five years on the land sold, disappears from the compacts, as they are called, with these States as early as the year 1836, so far as regards sales. When Missouri came in in 1820 the limitation was made on sold lands for five years and on bounty lands for three years, which was as plain a declaration as language can make that bounty lands were not lands sold that had net proceeds. By the compact with Missouri it was agreed that she would not tax for five years the lands that were sold, the net proceeds of which she was to have the benefit in one way or another of 5 per cent. upon, but as to the military bounty lands she was authorized to tax them after three years.

After that there came the State of Arkansas, the provision in which was that bounty lands should not be taxed for three years but that the State might tax the lands sold instantly without any limitation at all. That was in the year 1836, forty-four years ago. Then came the State of Michigan in the same year, in respect of which there was the same provision authorizing the State to tax the lands sold instantly, but she agreeing that she would not tax the military bounty lands for three years. I am speaking by the book, so that there is no mistake about it.

Then came the State of Florida in 1845, the next State admitted, in respect of which there was no limitation either as to the lands sold or as to the bounty lands. The reservation of exemption from taxation for three years as to the bounty lands was given up by the United States as to that particular State. Then came the State of Iowa admitted at the same time with Florida, where there was no limitation upon the right of the State to tax the sold lands, but it was agreed by the State of Iowa, as it was not agreed by the State of Florida, that the bounty lands should be free from taxation for three years, while there was no limitation as to the lands sold.

Then came in 1846 the next State, Wisconsin, where there was no limitation as to the taxation either of lands sold or of bounty lands. Then came the State of Oregon in respect of which there was no limitation of taxation either upon lands sold or upon bounty lands. Then came the State of Minnesota in 1857 where there was no limitation of taxation either upon lands sold or upon bounty lands. Then came the State of Kansas, that much abused and suffering community that has been overridden by eastern capital, and has been gridironed with railroads built, as the Senator says, by eastern capital and as I must suppose to the great burden and detriment of its people, in respect of which there was no limitation in regard to the right of taxation of any lands the moment the title of the Government was parted with.

Then in 1864 came the State of Nebraska—she was admitted afterward, but that was the date of the enabling act—in respect of which there was no limitation of taxation as to either sold lands or bounty lands. Then came Nevada in 1864 in respect to which there was no limit. Next came Colorado, the last of the admitted States, in respect of which also in 1875 there was no limitation.

Here then are eleven of the eighteen States named in this bill, in respect of which the United States never asked and the States never agreed to renounce the taxation of lands sold for a single day; and yet the argument has been entirely based—I think I am safe in saying entirely based—upon the grounds that this was the consideration as they call it, which would not prove anything if it were true. But putting it upon that ground, the consideration, as it is called, upon which this money is now demanded in respect of eleven of these eighteen States never existed at all; and when you turn to the other part of the consideration, now mentioned by the Senator from Kansas, of the States giving up their right to tax the lands of the United States, their right to interfere with the primary disposal of the soil (which was another of the qualifications of their admission,) their right to impede the free navigation of the Mississippi River and its affluents (which was another of its qualifications,) the honorable Senator from Kansas says these surrenders of right made a consideration which entitles these States now to tax the people of the United States to pay into their treasuries these moneys, amounting as I say upon the bill as it stands, when you get it all together and as it will turn out, to hard upon $10,000,000. To say nothing about scrip, the 5 per cent. on the mere bounty lands alone since 1847 down to last year amounts to almost $5,000,000; and this bill contains scrip as well as it contains bounty lands—

Mr. McDONALD rose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator will pardon me. If I am going on to-night, I must go on myself. He will excuse me if I decline to be interrupted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont declines to be interrupted.

Mr. McDONALD. Not even to correct a statement?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not even to correct a statement. The Senator can correct me afterward. The little time that I can trespass upon the patience of the Senate at this hour of the evening, must be my time and not that of anybody else. Nobody knows better than my honorable friend from Indiana how glad I should be to be corrected by anything he could say; but as I know how impatient the Senate is, and in view of the fact that there is barely a quorum here now, it would be an injustice to everybody else to prolong the few things I have to say by the colloquy that would inevitably occur.

Mr. McDONALD. My correction would not have taken half this time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perhaps not, but the Senator is so astute that my answer to the correction might have required two hours. There is where the difficulty comes in.

Now, Mr. President, I repeat that in respect of this consideration, as it is called, touching the primary disposition of the soil, the abnegation of the pretense of taxation of the lands of the United States, and the free navigation of the Mississippi River and its affluents, that sort of argument on the part of the Senator from Kansas and those who have gone before him fills me with amazement. Is there any Senator who will stand up here at this moment or when I am through—because he cannot stand up at this moment, for I must finish what I have to say—and assert that he believes that at any time, without these compacts, any State, after it was admitted, could interfere with the free navigation of the Mississippi River? I do not think there is. Is there any Senator who will stand up and say that any State after she was admitted could proceed to tax the lands of the United States lying within her borders that the United States owned when she came in, in its sovereign character as a nation? I am sure there is not. Is there any Senator who will stand up and say that any State could interfere, in the very language of the Senator from Kansas and of the acts—because he is an accurate man and quoted them rightly—with the primary disposition of the soil, and undertake to dictate the terms upon which the United States should dispose of its public domain? There is not, I am safe in saying.

Why then were these clauses introduced into these acts of admission, the Senator will say? Not as a consideration of a contract or a compact between these States coming in and the General Government, but in order to renounce any pretext that might arise in the hurry or the passion or the excitement of some particular State, to interfere with the rights of the General Government. That was all.

It was the renunciation of an absolutely untenable pretension, if there was any such pretension ever, as the Supreme Court of the United States as to taxation and as to some of these other questions about the soil has over and over again decided. But it did not need a decision. Is there anybody who will stand up and say that the provision that the States shall not tax the lands of non-residents at a greater rate than it taxed the lands of its own resident citizens, was a renunciation by any State of a right that it would otherwise have had? Not if there is any value left in that clause of the original Constitution which said that the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States should be equal in all the States, under which it was never within the competence of a State to treat a citizen of another State in respect of the enjoyment of his property in any different way from what it would treat a citizen of its own State.

So we may dismiss, Mr. President, all that theory of these incoming States giving up rights that they otherwise would have possessed in the respects that I have mentioned, as the merest shadow of a shade. It was the giving up of a dream, and not the giving up of a reality or anything that anybody ever supposed was a reality at all. It was a wholesome security that the Government of the Union took against interminable lawsuits and injuries that might happen in certain states of affairs against citizens of other States and against the people of the United States and its Government generally. There was therefore no consideration about that.

So then, as it was rightly stated when this debate began by the Senator from Indiana, who would not maintain any of the doctrines that I have now referred to, the consideration part of this business, on which the report of this committee is based, was the consideration that the States would not tax lands that they otherwise would have had a right to tax, which had been sold by the United States, within five years after their sale. As to that there are only seven of these States that had any such consideration in their contract at all; and yet it has been found convenient, as the Senator from Kansas says, to put the whole eighteen in in order to agree upon a common basis, I believe his language was, which as I must suppose would enable them as they thought to put this bill through. There does not seem to be any other logical deduction from the statement of the honorable Senator from Kansas so candidly and properly made.

Now, Mr. President, let us come back to the bounty land business for a while. When the State of Ohio was admitted into the Union in the year 1802 the laws of the United States already provided for bounty lands; they already provided for the sales of public lands; two entirely different and distinct systems of disposal of the public lands. Each one of these States engaged in its compact that it would never interfere with the right of the United States to dispose of the soil as the United States pleased. That was a part of the compact. I beg Senators from these States to remember that while the United States engaged to pay for their benefit or in some way tending to their benefit, 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales, these States engaged in order that there might never be any future embarrassment as to the complete sovereign right of the United States to do what it liked with these lands, sales or not, that they would in no way interfere with the complete sovereign right of the United States to deal with the lands as it pleased. That was an express and literal part of the contract, and yet that is a part of the contract which these Senators complain of. They say that the United States in accordance with this compact in making the primary disposition of this soil, the property of all the people, has chosen to make it in a way that is not agreeable to these States, although the States themselves agreed that they would never in any way interfere with this thing, and in that of course is included every means of opposition to it or of claim upon it. In other words the sovereignty of the United States was left absolutely free to dispose of the soil as it liked, and only engaged that out of the net proceeds, it would apply a certain per cent. in a certain way. And nobody has yet contended that "net proceeds" did not mean money in that sense; it is said these bounty land warrants are the equivalent; but everybody agrees I believe so far that the "net proceeds" on which a percentage was to be paid over to the State must be some kind of money, either silver or gold or bank bills, which the Senator objects to; but I will not waste your time about that. What becomes of that part of the compact?

Here then, Mr. President, was a public engagement by the States themselves, every one of them, that while it was agreed they were to have the benefit of 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of sales, that should not interfere, nor should anything else in their admission interfere, with the right of the United States to have supreme control over the disposition of these lands, to do anything it liked with them; and why should it not? At the very time when the first State came in, Ohio, in which any of these lands lay—Kentucky and Vermont came in before, but there were no public lands that belonged to the United States in those States—when the State of Ohio came in, there were two distinct systems of the disposition of public lands in operation. One was by sale, the net proceeds of which came into the common Treasury, and came into the common Treasury under an express trust of the noble State of Virginia, that gave an empire to the United States to help it out of its financial difficulties, that the income of that property should be for the benefit of all and all equally. At that time I say there were two distinct systems, one was of sales that produced money to the Treasury; the other was of bounty land warrants that not only the State of Virginia, but the Continental Congress and the Congress of the United States, after the new Constitution was formed, had by laws passed by Congress provided for in the way of bounty lands to soldiers. In that state of things the State of Ohio and the United States made this compact.

Senators say that they do not ask for generosity, because they have had enough of it; they have been smothered with generosity already, as they put it; they only ask for law. Now, then, when this first contract was made, which all the others merely followed, between the United States and the State of Ohio, look at the existing condition of things. There was the public land law providing for sales, and there was the military bounty land law providing for giving bounty land warrant and locations by soldiers, both on the statute-books; so that the State of Ohio and the United States knew them and understood them both alike.

What did they agree to? They agreed first that 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands of the United States sold by Congress should be applied to building roads, &c., either in the State of Ohio or leading to it. Can anybody say, will anybody say that at that time and with these acts of Congress providing for bounty lands and sales separately, the "net proceeds of the sales of public lands" was intended to include the bounty lands which had already been granted or might thereafter be granted for the benefit of soldiers? It would be a contradiction in terms. There was no surprise upon the State of Ohio. The systems already existed, and she chose to agree that whatever fund was raised in cash 5 per cent. of it should be applied to certain uses. She did not choose to insist that a tax of 5 per cent. on all the people of the United States should be raised on the value of the lands given to soldiers to pay for building roads in her State; and whatever the reason of it? and that applies to all of them; I take her to begin with because she was the first State. What was the reason of this provision? It was necessary and beneficial to the inhabitants of the new States that roads and canals and public improvements, and if you take the later ones, schools in one or two instances, should be instituted. Roads and canals could not be constructed and public schools could not be erected without money. How was money to be got? The new settler, who, with his ax on his shoulder, went into the forest of Ohio and cut down an acre of the great timber on that magnificent plain and river country had not any money. He had his strength and his tools and his courage; but when it came to hard cash that was to pay for building roads and canals, to open up communication between him and his family and friends that he had left behind, he had not the means. What was to be done? You could do one of two things. You could say to the State of Ohio, "Now you may tax these lands from the very moment they are sold to this settler who goes over there with his ax and get out of him the money necessary to pay for the building of these roads, because the money has got to be raised," or else "we will take 5 per cent. of the proceeds of all the lands that are sold in your State, and when we have got the money for them we will build a road with it, and we will let the hardy pioneer go free from taxation on his little settlement of one hundred and sixty acres for five years until he can earn money by cutting down the forest and raising his crops and selling his products to build his own roads;" and that was it.

Therefore, anybody can see that the idea, if it had been advanced then, that the bounty lands were to pay a part of these things was absolutely absurd; and the idea that the bounty lands were to be free from taxation, upon this theory, was equally absurd for the reason that only the man who paid all the money he had to buy his land was to be considered as having paid his tax; the soldier who had not paid up his money to buy his land but had got it already, if he had any money could contribute his portion. And that was the very theory on which you came down to make the distinction in later States of five years' exemption to the land purchaser and only three years to the soldier. It was not to make a discrimination against the soldier, but it was to make a discrimination in favor of raising money to carry on the works of necessary internal improvement for the benefit of all, and to say that the man who had not paid money to buy his land and who, therefore, had not contributed anything to this fund to build the roads should not be exempt so long as the man who had. That is all there is to it. It was a perfectly simple state of the case and perfectly understood.

What happened next—which illustrates this whole thing and ought to make an end of it so far as the law goes? As the law stood when Ohio came in, there were certain expenses of surveys of the public lands which by law had not been charged to sales before; and therefore when the State of Ohio came in, her 5 per cent.—I speak of it as hers although it was not to be payable to her in that particular case but always to be paid out by Congress though now it is to be paid into the treasury of Ohio which is quite a different thing but I call it hers for the purpose of this argument—as the thing then stood her 5 per cent. would be computed on a much larger sum than it was after a change of the law by Congress. Congress, after Ohio came in, proceeded to make laws charging the expense of surveys of the lands of the United States lying within the State of Ohio, and other States as well, on the proceeds of the sales. Ohio being always alive to her interests at once brought the attention of the Government of the United States to it and said just as the Senators from Iowa and Kansas and all the others, except I am proud to say, Alabama and Florida, "Why, here, you are trenching upon our rights; you are charging over expenses against this 5 per cent. fund that did not exist when we came in and therefore you are violating the contract." As between private persons it would have been a violation of the contract; but what did the United States say and what did Ohio acquiesce in from that day to this, a period of fifty-six years lacking about a dozen days? The case was referred to the Attorney-General of the United States, William Wirt, a man whose character and fame and law learning I need not stop at this late hour to say anything about. He said in the opinion I have before me, volume 1 of the Opinions of the Attorneys-General, page 641, this:

The question is whether, after the passage of the act of the 26th March, 1804, the surveying expenses are to be deducted from the amount of sales, and the 3 per cent. to be paid to Ohio is to be calculated on what will remain after such deduction, or whether the 3 per cent. is to be calculated on the amount of sales without such deduction?

The Secretary of the Treasury has adopted the former opinion—

That is that the expenses were to be taken out—

The report of the committee of Ohio adopts the latter—

Which I suppose to be a committee of the Legislature of the State of Ohio—

The report vindicates this latter opinion on the ground that the act of the 3d March, 1803, is a compact between the United States and the State of Ohio; that this compact was founded on the state of things existing at the time; that, according to the state of things existing at that time, the expenses of surveying constituted no charge upon the funds on which the 3 per cent. was to be calculated; that neither of the parties to the compact can change the terms of it without the consent of the other party; that the act of the 26th March, 1804, exempting the purchasers from the payments of the expenses of surveying—

Which they were not exempted from when Ohio came in—

was the act of the United States, one of the parties to the compact only, which can have no effect on the other party; and, consequently, that the State of Ohio has the right to insist that the 3 per cent. shall be calculated now as it was calculated at the date of the compact, to wit, on the amount of sales, without deducting the expenses of surveying.

That the act of the 3d March, 1803, was a compact, or the affirmation of a compact, between the United States and the State of Ohio, seems to be unquestionable; and the argument is conclusive, if the other proposition on which it rests be true—that this compact was founded on the existing state of things, and contemplated that this state of things should remain immutable. But if, on the other hand, it was within the contemplation of the contracting parties at the time, that the power to regulate the terms of sale should remain in Congress, then the parties will be considered as contracting with reference to the exercise of this continuing power, and its exercise can work no breach of the contract.

On the supposition that the existing state of things was to remain immutable, so far as this compact was concerned, then Congress had no power to introduce any change into the existing regulations for the sale of the public lands in Ohio.

If, for example, the organization of the offices engaged in those sales should have been found so wholly insufficient as to put a total stop to those sales, Congress could not introduce another system somewhat more expensive, without a violation of the compact with Ohio.

So, again, at the time of the compact the minimum price of the public lands was $2 per acre. If it should have been found that the individual owners of land in that State had it in their power to offer terms so much more attractive to purchasers as to put an entire stop to the sale of the public lands, Congress could not reduce the terms without a violation of the compact with Ohio. But this thing has been done, and it is not understood that Ohio has complained.

As of course she did not, although in respect of the very subject of sales alone, saying nothing now about anything else, when Ohio came in the minimum price of the land was $2 an acre, and Congress within a very few years reduced the minimum price to a dollar and a half, or whatever the first reduction was, and Ohio did not profess, as William Wirt says, to complain of that, although it was within the very letter of the contract; and why? He proceeds to tell you why.

And if Congress had the power to reduce the price, and thus to diminish the proceeds of sales by nearly one-half, I cannot see what reason any other modification for which the public good called should be charged as a breach of the compact and made a ground of complaint.

The great object in view was the sale of the public lands. The interests of the United States and Ohio coincided in the advancement of this object. Ohio was interested not only in the 3 per cent., but in the general fund to be raised by these sales. As a member of the Union, she had a voice in devising the means of promoting the sales. The supposition that the system of land sales which was in force at the time of the compact was to remain inflexible, and to yield to no change in the condition of the country and to no light which future experience might throw upon the subject, does not appear to me to be rational. It would have been at war with the interests of both the parties to the compact, and, therefore, cannot be believed to have been within their contemplation. It seems to me that it must have been expected on both sides that this power of altering the terms of sale should remain in Congress, and that in exercising it they should be governed by the fluctuating circumstances of the country and guided by the lights of experience. On this principle Congress has acted: relieving the purchasers from time to time of previous burdens which might have impeded the sales, altering the terms of payment, and, finally, reducing the minimum price from $2 to $1.25. And in all these alterations Ohio has had a voice. It was in the course of this process of holding out stronger inducements to purchasers, and thereby accelerating the sales, that the act of 1864 was passed, which relieved the purchasers from the expenses of surveying.

Then he proceeds in the same strain, coming to the conclusion that the suggestion of the committee of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, that because Congress had taken the expense of the survey of the public lands that were bought, off from the purchasers and put it on the fund, there was a breach of the contract, was entirely unfounded. Why? Because he says it must have been in the nature of things the mutual understanding of both sides that the sovereign dominion remained with Congress, of which the State of Ohio formed a part by her representatives in this Chamber and the other, to regulate the disposition even of sales, which were within the very letter as well as spirit of the compact, entirely as the sense of Congress respecting the public good should require; and that having done so, although she reduced the price of the lands after the compact by one-half, although she charged upon the net proceeds expenses that before were charged upon the purchaser, these acts were entirely in accordance with the contract and not a breach of it, because her sovereign dominion over the disposition of these lands by sale was intended by the parties to be left entirely intact.

If that be true as to the right of Congress, these States participating in the government of the country, and for the public good to sell the lands for one-half the price that they bore at the time these respective States were admitted, or to charge them with double the expense they were charged with before; if these acts were no breach of the contract, how can it be a breach of the contract, or a departure from it, either in letter or spirit, for Congress to proceed and continue to do as she was doing at the time the first State came in, to make a separate disposition of part of these lands as a reward for the faithful services of her soldiers? Nobody can answer that in any way but one; no human ingenuity can answer it in any way but one. The State of Ohio for more than fifty years has acquiesced in that construction of the statute as applied to sales and has acquiesced in that construction of the statute as applied to bounty lands, as has every other State in this Union until within a very recent period.

The State of Iowa, feeling that it was a good thing to have every matter determined in the time of it, soon after she came in authorized her governor in 1858 to call the attention of the Government of the United States to this subject of bounty lands and to suggest that the United States ought to pay her 5 per cent. for the use of her schools upon the dollar-and-a-quarter valuation of the lands entered with military bounty land warrants; and accordingly on the 7th of September, 1858, nearly three years before the war began which my friend on my left [Mr. KIRKWOOD] supposed was the reason they did not push it here, the governor of the State addressed this letter to the Secretary of the Interior:

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER, IOWA, September 7, 1858.

Hon. JACOB THOMPSON, Secretary, &c.:

Sir: The last General Assembly of this State instructed me by resolution to institute a suit in the Court of Claims for the recovery or allowance of the 5 per cent. due the State (as it is claimed) on the sale of the public lands by military land warrants, if Congress or your Department still refused to recognize the claim.

Here I will interrupt the reading of the letter to state that the Court of Claims was organized in the year 1855, twenty-five years ago, and that by the law organizing that court every one of these States had and still has a perfect right to sue the United States for the breach of any contract that it contends exists and try its case upon its merits, and that is what the governor of the State of Iowa alludes to in this letter to the Secretary of the Interior:

While at Washington in May last I had the honor of presenting for your consideration, both in person, verbally, and in writing, some of the grounds upon which I then and still think the State is entitled to this fund. In looking over again your very brief reply to my statement I observe that you use the phrase "military bounty land warrants," and that in your opinion the claim of the State is not shown to rest upon any statute of the United States which would authorize your Department to allow the 5 per cent. upon lands located by such warrants. It occurred to me that possibly in the midst of your multifarious duties you may have overlooked the distinction which in my haste I no doubt imperfectly made between the bounty land warrants that issued under the act of 1850 to those serving in the Indian wars and the war of 1812, and the military land warrants founded upon the act of Congress approved February 11, 1847, in which one hundred and sixty acres of land were offered in advance as an inducement to enlist in the Mexican war, and afterward these warrants were issued in fulfillment of the contract of enlistment. The former were bounties, the latter based on a consideration, and therefore it follows that lands located with this class of warrants constitutes a sale in law.

That is the argument of the governor. You will observe, Mr. President, and so will the gentlemen who do me the honor to listen to me, that the governor of the State of Iowa after this careful consideration of the subject abandons all claim for any percentage upon military bounty land warrants that he considers to be a bounty; that is to say, any military land warrant that was issued under an act of Congress for the past services of the soldiers, and bases himself upon the act of February 11, 1847, which provided, as every Senator I suppose knows, certainly the Senator from Iowa does, for raising ten additional regiments, and provided that anybody who enlisted in those regiments and served in the war with Mexico should have one hundred and sixty acres of land. All the "bounty" business is here abandoned.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me one moment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, although I did not allow my friend from Indiana. I never can resist Ohio. I give it up.

Mr. THURMAN. I only want to say that the governor of Iowa lost nothing by that, for there were no revolutionary bounty land warrants and no warrants of the war of 1812 ever located in Iowa.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know whether that is true or not.

Mr. THURMAN. That distinction which he made did not affect Iowa; she did not lose by it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very likely; but I am sure I would not impute it to the governor of Iowa that he put in a distinction because he did not lose a dollar by it, because we all know that the greatest pride and glory of the State of Iowa always is to pay into the Treasury and not to take out of it. So then I think it is rather hard on Iowa to get the governor of Iowa out on the ground that he was waiving that ground, because he would not lose anything by doing so.

Mr. ALLISON. My friend will allow me to make a suggestion. If he will read a few sentences further he will discover that the governor of Iowa did not abandon the claim.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am going to read a few sentences further; I have a good deal to read yet.

Mr. ALLISON. I mean of that particular letter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I believe I have read correctly as far as I have gone, and I suppose I am entitled to make my comments. If not the Senator from Iowa can call me to order.

Mr. ALLISON. I beg pardon of the Senator. I understood him to say that the governor of Iowa here abandoned the claim.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator understood me to say exactly what I have read, that he says "In looking over again your very brief reply to my statement I observe that you use the phrase, military bounty land warrants;" and I say "bounty" with an emphasis because the governor of Iowa does; and I should be very sorry to do anything that the governor of Iowa never did.

And that in your opinion the claim of the State is not shown to rest upon any statute of the United States which would authorize your Department to allow the 5 per cent. upon lands located by such warrants. It occurred to me that possibly in the midst of your multifarious duties—

That is a very handsome phrase!—

you may have overlooked the distinction—

Is there anybody in Iowa but the governor who understands the distinction? And is he to be taken and held up to public scorn here because he says there is a distinction? I hope not—

You may have overlooked the distinction which in my haste I no doubt imperfectly made between the bounty land warrants that issued under the act of 1850 to those serving in the Indian wars and the war of 1812, and the military land warrants founded upon the act of Congress approved February 11, 1847, in which one hundred and sixty acres of land were offered in advance as an inducement to enlist in the Mexican war.

I hope I have not misrepresented the governor of Iowa so far. It may be that in the codicil to his will he takes this all back, but there is no mistaking what he means so far. Whether or not the fact is as the Senator from Ohio suggests, that does not interfere with the argument of the governor of Iowa; it only puts it upon the narrow and I hope untenable ground that the governor of Iowa gave up apparently that view for the simple reason that there was not anything to be made out of it in point of cash. I trust he gave it up on great solid reasons. Now, then:

This distinction, to my mind, was so clear that I confess I submitted the matter to your decision, with a confident expectation that you would recognize the claim, and I hope you will pardon me for inquiring whether in disallowing the claim you regarded these two classes of land warrants in the same light, both as being bounty land warrants. I would be gratified to have your views somewhat at length upon this subject, for I may have some misconception of this matter, and the grounds of your opinion might determine me—might determine me not to pursue the claim any further. I need not say that I have confidence both in your judgment and in your impartiality, for you have the reputation of being a sound lawyer, and I know your own State is interested in the same question.

That he says is a strong ground for supposing the Secretary is perfectly impartial, as I know my friend from Iowa is, whose State is only going to get a million or so out of this particular pot—

I know your own State is interested in the same question. You will perceive that it is a question of great importance to this State, and therefore there is some apology for pressing a careful consideration of the same, and the act of the 11th February, 1847, providing for the enlistment of volunteers in the Mexican war, and the argument I had the honor of submitting to you in the month of May last.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

RALPH P. LOWE.

I fail to see where the qualification comes in that my eager friend spoke about of his taking back anything on the distinction. I will hand the letter over to him and let him point it out.

Mr. ALLISON. I am much obliged to my friend, but I only wanted to call his attention to the fact that the governor of Iowa, a little further on in this letter, said that he thought the claim was so clear with reference to bounties issued under the act of 1847 that there could be no doubt about it. Of course there was doubt about the warrants issued under the act of 1850, which was all he said.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The governor of Iowa does not say there was a reasonable doubt about the warrants issued under the act of 1850. He says there is a clear distinction between them.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly; and the first are so clear that there ought to be no objection to them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And that the second is so clear that he does not make any claim; but he does not say that the first act, the act of 1847 is so clear that there ought not to be any doubt about it. He says it is so clear that he asks the Secretary again to consider it and not to forget that his own State, Mr. Thompson's State, has an interest in the pool. Well, Mr. Thompson, whatever faults he had afterward, did not forget I presume that his own State had an interest in it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Does the Senator—

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator will pardon me a moment. I am going on at a great disadvantage. Will he be kind enough to wait until I finish on this point, because I declined to yield to my friend from Indiana, and it would not be quite fair to yield to anybody else. The Secretary of the Interior did reconsider the subject and being as the governor of Iowa said from a State that had an interest in the question, and being therefore perfectly impartial he proceeds to reply on the 20th of September, 1858, to the governor of Iowa in which he says that he has received this letter of the 7th and having now read the law, &c., he proceeds:

I have the honor to state that, in my opinion, the act of 1847 to which you refer is a bounty land act, and that no distinction can properly be made between locations made under it and those made under other bounty land laws. The location of warrants issued under the act of 1847 is not considered as constituting a sale of the public lands as contemplated by the act admitting Iowa into the Union. That act appropriates 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of sales of all public lands for making public roads and canals within the State. There being no net proceeds accruing from locations by military land warrants, the allowance of 5 per cent on such locations cannot be regarded as having been appropriated or provided for by law.

J. THOMPSON,
Secretary.

Governor R. P. LOWE, Iowa.

The State of Iowa, then, in the year 1858 authorized its governor, instructed him, as the governor says, to bring a suit in the Court of Claims against the United States to recover this money, a suit that the State of Iowa had a perfect right to bring and has at this moment. The only reason why she would fail, if she failed at all, would be the fact that the law was not on her side. The governor of the State of Iowa says, "Now, before I take any step I would like to have you look it over again. I know that you are a great lawyer; I know that you are regarded by everybody as an upright and impartial man; I know that you have no bias against this claim because your own State if I am right has a similar one. Now look at it again, because if you will," says the governor of Iowa, "I may be controlled in the step that I shall take next." What is that? Whether to follow the authority of the State to bring suit in the Court of Claims or to abandon it. He got his reply from the Secretary of the Interior, and what did the governor of Iowa do next? Did he bring any suit in the Court of Claims? Not much. I have had the records of the Court of Claims searched to find any trace of a suit instituted by or on behalf of the State of Iowa by its governor or anybody else, for this demand, but there is no such case there. There has been a period, to be sure, of only twenty-two years in which to do it, and perhaps they have not employed counsel enough to get the papers ready. No, Mr. President, to leave off badinage, the governor of Iowa himself, I have no doubt an impartial and upright man, biased of course in favor of his own State, its agent in bringing this matter to the consideration of a perfectly impartial tribunal, not another party, as it is between man and man, but just as this matter is now brought before us Senators as a high tribunal of the Government standing impartially between these States and all the others and all the people, induced the Secretary of the Interior to again consider and decide it, and the governor of the State of Iowa and the State of Iowa acquiesced in that decision as sound and took no step to enforce the alleged claim.

I know my honorable friend [Mr. KIRKWOOD] himself one of the most capable and honorable and efficient governors of that State, in a time of great peril and distress too, says that an excuse for that, a rebuttal of the presumption of acquiescence, is to be found in the fact that the rebellion came on, and that the State of Iowa, as he so eloquently and elegantly put it, was engaged in raising troops and forwarding them to the front, and she could not stop to make any little demand on the Government of the United States for the adjustment of questions of this kind—a most beautiful sentiment, Mr. President. But on looking into the resolutions of the State of Iowa running through the years of the war, and on looking at the acts of Congress for the benefit of—no, I will not say benefit, I will say for operations in the State of Iowa, the land grants, and so forth—I find that the State of Iowa, while she was foremost in the battle, was also not behind in urging her interests before Congress, and that whenever she thought she wanted or could get extensions of land grants, new grants, giving up the Des Moines lands above the Raccoon Forks, and ever so many things that I will not waste time in talking about, because correctly they have nothing to do with this subject—I only refer to them because my honorable friend made a point about them—Iowa, brilliant and ready and zealous as she was in battle, was not sleepy in the halls of Congress in taking care of all her business interests. That the record will bear out.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Doubtless. I should like to say a word in regard to that—

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will be kind enough to wait until I am through. I am not feeling well and the Senate has obliged me to go on. We have plenty of time between now and ten o'clock. There is not the slightest hurry.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I supposed the understanding was that the Senator was to close the debate on this matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no such understanding. The Senator from Iowa has the full right to speak as long as he likes after I am through. My only reason for declining to yield to my friend from Indiana [Mr. McDONALD] was not, as he knows, out of any sort of resentment or any other improper feeling, but from the fact that the Senate thought we ought to go on and finish this business, and I wanted to condense what I had to say into the smallest possible limit, not feeling very well myself, and that is the reason I must ask my friend from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] to excuse me for not permitting him to interrupt the little else I have to say.

Now let us look a little further about this business. I have endeavored to show you (and I think I have beyond the possibility of a cavil) that at the time when the State of Ohio came into this Union,—the first one to make these compacts, which, in respect of the 5 per cent. of net proceeds, are exactly alike with every State; not as to what is to become of it, but in respect to 5 per cent. being reserved out of sales of the public lands, it is the same in every one of the acts,—there then existed not only sales of public lands where it was agreed 5 per cent. should be taken out, but provisions for disposing of public lands by bounties that were not put into the compact act at all, that stood at that time upon an entirely different footing. And the State of Ohio, while she was looking sharply to her interests under the sales and promptly calling the attention of the Government to a change in the charges on the fund arising from the sales, never thought of saying there was any ground of complaint about the bounty lands, although the system then existed and it has only been enlarged since, and at the time when the attention of the Government was called to the subject by the State of Ohio, the law officer of the Government informed the State of Ohio that this whole compact stood upon this broad principle, that the primary disposition of these lands was left just where it was in the first place, within the sovereign discretion of the Congress of the United States, of whom the State of Ohio with all the other States formed a component and inseparable part, and that it was no part of the intention of the contracting parties that the power of Congress to dispose of these lands in any way, according to its discretion, should be in the least degree affected by this compact about the 5 per cent., but only that whatever sum of money did arise from the sales of these lands and came into the Treasury should, after paying all the necessary expenses out of it, be devoted to certain public objects. That was all.

If that be true, as it is true upon the history and the record before us, what becomes of this claim as a mere point of law, that you are to construe the words "net proceeds of the sales of the public lands" as covering the disposition by Congress of other lands, as bounties to soldiers, whether they are bounties of gratitude, or whether they are bounties of consideration, because, as it has been argued by both Senators from Florida and by the Senator from Kansas, the principle upon which you would extend this grant covers the homesteads, it covers the agricultural college lands, it covers the railroad grants, it covers the swamp lands, it covers the canal grants, it covers every single grant that has been made by Congress, except possibly the New Madrid certificates that were given for relocation where an earthquake destroyed the land of some settlers in the valley of the Mississippi, and Congress as an act of generosity and charity gave these people, whose lands had been swallowed up by an earthquake, a chance to locate somewhere else? Possibly that might come out, but that is all.

Is it really possible that the Senators from these States which are, as Governor Lowe says, interested in this thing, can persuade themselves, (because I know they are just as honest as I am, I beg them not to suppose that I am criticising their good faith,) that, in point of legal construction, they are entitled to this money upon bounty lands?

That is not all, but of course that would be a matter of detail, but it illustrates the looseness of this bill. Every one of the acts admitting these States provides in explicit terms that the net proceeds of the sales that the State is to have any benefit from, either greater or less, are to be the proceeds of sales after a certain date, excepting, I believe, Nebraska, which says, "past and future sales;" but we leave Nebraska out for the time being. What does this bill provide? It provides that you are to count in the bounty lands and the military scrip as well, (which has not been much adverted to,) for all past time, without any reference to the date of the contract or the limitation provided in the act of admission. What does that mean? Of course, nobody would contend, I suppose, that that is right, except somebody whose mind has got into such a state of extraordinary delusion as to the meaning of the law as to the rest, that he thinks it is not worth while to mince matters, and if the compact with the State of Iowa is only for the net proceeds of the sales of public lands after the 1st of January, 1847, therefore, she is to have the net proceeds of the sales of public lands before the 1st of January, 1847.

The logic, to be sure, would not be very different, although the application of it would be somewhat serious to the people of the United States.

Then, Mr. President, when we go along, we find these acts of admission as it respects taxation presently dropped entirely the restriction as to the taxation of lands sold, but continued for some years to still say that military bounty lands should not be taxed. How can you construe that in any sort of harmony with the provision of this bill? If military bounty lands are a part of the lands sold, then they would have always fallen within the five years' limitation; there would have been no necessity for speaking of them as a separate and different thing to which a different rule was to be applied. The men who made the law saw that they stood upon an entirely different ground, not merely by description, but upon a different policy; that this 5 per cent. was to stand in lieu of the money that would be paid by the tax-payer to build the roads and to keep up the schools, and therefore the man who came in and settled with a military warrant ought to bear the same burden that his neighbor who had paid for his lands in cash had already borne, and therefore he should not be exempted so long as the other man. As I said before, it was not a discrimination made against the soldier, but it was a discrimination made in point of common sense in respect of raising money to carry on the operations of these young communities where some money must be raised in some way. Those who had paid the full price of their lands in cash were free for five years, because the 5 per cent. was then taking the place of their taxes. Those who had not been free for a less time, giving them an opportunity to build up.

Some of the gentlemen have said that these various States have received no corresponding benefits, that there is a real equity in this claim as well as some color of foundation in point of law. Let us see where the equity is. If a Senator or anybody else is indebted to another Senator or anybody else and is about to die and makes his will and gives to his creditor a certain sum of money or other valuable thing, the law says (not because it is technical, but because it is just and proceeds upon the principles of common sense) that by that process of giving the debt is satisfied; it is redeemed, as one phrase is. Why? Because the giving party is expected to have taken into consideration, when he is making this bounty to his legatee, the state of their business relations before. As I say, it is not a technical construction; it is put upon broad principles of common sense,—the supposed intention of the testator.

Now, here was this slumbering claim, if it may be called a claim at all, beginning with the State of Ohio more than seventy-five years ago, and coming down one by one through these States. During all this time, down to the year 1858, when Iowa brought this claim, so far as she was concerned, under the act of 1847, to the attention of the Government of the United States, nobody had ever suspected that such a claim existed. Ohio had presented her suggestions about charges upon this fund; she had had them answered adversely to her and she had acquiesced. During all this time of the sleeping of these claims, these various States, one by one, in greater or less degree, had been appealing to Congress, (and I use the word "appealing" in its fullest sense,) through their Senators and Representatives for grants of lands which they thought, rightly or wrongly, would be a benefit to their States, and Congress granted them, granted them in immense quantities. I am not complaining of it; I do not know but that I should have voted for every one.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) Will the Senator from Vermont give way for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir, I think not. The Senate has refused to adjourn. I am sorry to stand in the way of the will of the Senator; I am sorry to disoblige anybody; but the Senate thought that it ought to go on.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I think the Senate has changed its mind.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, the Senate never changes its mind!

Mr. BURNSIDE. I have known it to do so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Congress has granted lands in some of the cases on the special application of the State of Iowa, for instance, whose resolutions I hold in my hand, stating not merely that the general benefit of the people of the United States would be advanced by giving her further grants of land, but that the people of particular sections of her own State had not got as much benefit out of the previous grants as they ought to have gotten, and therefore instructing her Senators and Representatives to go for more. There is the book. [Exhibiting.] The United States, not thinking of what was likely to happen in this year of our Lord, proceeded to respond in a cheerful spirit, and here I have a small colored map, an official one, [exhibiting,] which represents the proportion of the area of the States of Iowa and of Minnesota—they lie both together there—that is covered by land grants to those States and to corporations of them. The white part here [indicating] is lands that have not been granted by the United States, and these colored parts [indicating] cover the area that has been granted. It would take a microscope to find any spot on this map in the State of Iowa that is not covered by a land grant of Congress to that State or to a corporation in it. If the theory of this bill is true, every inch, roundly speaking, of land in that State according to this map, is to be computed at a dollar and a quarter an acre, and we are to pay 5 per cent. on that. I ought not to say "we." It is not a personal matter with me. The people of Vermont are poor and frugal and their share of the taxes is very small. I am almost as impartial about this as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] was about another question the other day.

We are to turn around, therefore, just as the Senator from Kansas argues (and his argument is logically correct) and as the printed report here states and say that the principle on which you are to compute bounty lands applies to all grants, and it applies in a very strong way too to all the railroad grants, because in almost every one of them there is a consideration that the mails of the United States are to be carried for a fixed price and that public munitions of war are to be carried free—a valuable money consideration. When Iowa was appealing for this to Congress for the benefit of her citizens, as the resolutions of her Legislature stated, she did not remember to tell us that she had a claim laying back that would call upon us to pay upon all the lands we had given to her in that way 5 per cent. into her treasury by and by; and I do not think it fair, putting it on the ground of generosity, on the ground of fair dealing. I think between man and man, if it had occurred between my honorable friend, the ex-governor, and myself, and I had been the proprietor of all these lands, as the people of the United States were, and he had come to me and said, "I want some grants for railroads in my State; the people in a particular corner have not got the benefit that the other fellows have by building these roads; I want you to give me more"—I think he would have told me then and there, "But you must bear in mind, my friend, that after you have given me these lands, I still have a claim upon you for 5 per cent. of their value at a dollar and a quarter an acre, because they are in legal effect sold under the original compact of admission; you have parted with them for a consideration, because I engage when I take them that I will carry the mails at a fixed price, and that I will carry the munitions of war and the troops for nothing at all."

Mr. President, it appears to me this does not appeal to anybody's sense of generosity. If it stands upon the law, then the State of Iowa is entitled to the benefit of the law unquestionably, although it would have been rather more frank in her representatives when they were getting these grants to have stated publicly, so that everybody would have understood it, "We take these grants, but you must not forget that under the original compact of admission we are to still have 5 per cent. out of the Treasury upon them just the same as if they had been sold for cash."

I beg my friend from Iowa to believe that I am not speaking of Iowa in any personal sense. I am only speaking of it to illustrate the theory that applies to all these States. I am not complaining of the conduct of her representatives in urging this matter upon our consideration now; it is perhaps their duty. I am appealing to their judgment when all sides of the question are presented, whether as the representatives of the whole people, as they are under the Constitution, and not of Iowa alone, they can say that the law warrants this, or that any principle of justice requires us to do it.

The Senator from Indiana stated the other day that it was true Indiana had got sundry benefits of canal grants, &c., during this time, as she had, but that she had spent a great deal more on these public objects than she had ever got. What if she had? Let us see how that was. The State of Indiana I believe had a grant of four or five million acres for the Wabash and Erie Canal.

Mr. McDONALD. No, sir; the entire grant to the State of Indiana was a little over two million acres altogether.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We will call it two million acres then. I am getting such a western way of speaking that I am rather exuberant in my statement possibly. It was a little over two million acres of public land, then, in the garden of the West. I suppose there is no State like the State of Indiana for the beauty and the fertility of its soil, and, I will add, for the absence of swamps, because I see that only a million or two more of acres have been given to her as swamp lands, and therefore I conclude that it is a very salubrious and not a swampy district, while in Iowa, which is the swampiest country in the world ever heard of, there are only a million and a half acres, I think, of swamp lands, though I think I heard somebody say the other day that there was not a tract of a hundred acres of Iowa in any one place not amenable to the plow to-day; but that is neither here nor there except as it comes to the question of 5 per cent. on the swamp lands, which we shall consider by and by.

The State of Indiana took these two million acres or over, which is a very convenient way of putting it, of public lands that was to build the Wabash and Erie Canal. The United States gave it for the special purpose, and with a provision, if I am not mistaken, which made that canal a public free highway for the benefit of all the people of the United States. What did the State of Indiana do? I am told, and that is the way her laws read, for I have looked at them, that the State of Indiana proceeded to issue bonds to build that canal, and when the bonds became due, not feeling it altogether convenient to pay them, she issued a new bond for half, (I believe it was scaled down one-half) and turned over the canal to pay the new bond. Was not that about the short of it?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was about the short of it. The consequence has been that the canal has been built, which is not a free canal to all the citizens of the United States just now—

Mr. THURMAN. There is no canal at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Which is just the same, as the children say, as no canal at all.

Mr. THURMAN. I mean the Indiana part of it. We still keep it up in Ohio.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, yes, there would not be any means for office-holders to come to Washington if you did not. [Laughter.] That is the great grief that the State of Indiana has suffered from, this public generosity, which my honorable friend from Indiana was so happy about the other day. I do not speak of this as complaining of the State of Indiana; I only speak of it as the story went, I believe in Jerusalem Delivered (if I am wrong my friend from Ohio will correct me,) when the bold Rinaldo got lost one day in the woods, as they say out West, and his friends to get him back went and held up to him a mirror simply, and said nothing, so that he could see himself as others saw him, and that led him to go back and join the army that he had abandoned before. Now I am only trying to hold up to the eyes of my friend from Indiana a mirror so that he can see exactly the attitude that his State stands in about this business, and about what sort of a ground it is upon which she claims that there is anything due from the United States in respect of making her even or anybody else in this country in regard to these lands.

If we come to the State of Illinois, that is so well represented on this floor, I notice that there have been land grants to that State.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Never but one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Never but one, and for the good reason, as they say in the West, that that scooped the board. I suppose that phrase is familiar to my honorable friend. The Illinois Central Railroad took what land there was in the State of Illinois that had not already been located by private purchasers; and I am told (undoubtedly the Senator from Illinois can state how it is) that a very handsome part of the revenues of that State, that are relieving its people from the taxation that the rest of the States have to bear to carry on their governments, is derived from the profits of the sales of the lands of the United States that were devoted to that enterprise.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The State was wise enough for that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, the State was wise enough to provide for carrying on a large part of its operations in perpetuity out of the lands that the State of Virginia gave to the United States for the common benefit of all its people, and for no other purpose whatever.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The franchise was worth something.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes the franchise to have public lands is worth a good deal. That accounts for this bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The franchise to build the road.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, yes; franchises are valuable things. Next to privileges they are the most valuable thing in the world.

That, Mr. President, and I might go over the whole of it State by State, is the way this thing stands. It stands just here; and I do not want to weary the Senate now; day after to-morrow I may think of something else to say. When this thing began, I repeat, because gentlemen now say they stand upon the law, there was to the knowledge of the State of Ohio, the first of these States, a distinct system of bounty lands separate from the system of the sales of lands; and they made the contract, by which they confined themselves to the net proceeds of the sales, knowing at that time that the lands were being disposed of in another way and for other objects that did not produce net proceeds; and knowing that the sovereign dominion of the United States over all the lands, as William Wirt stated when the question was raised a few years afterward, was never intended to be given up in any sense or for any purpose, and that it was within the lawful competence of the United States never to sell another acre; the State would have no right to complain, because all the States were the trustees of these lands for all the people, and their disposition of them for the common good so long as they did not bring money into the Treasury to be spent for these public purposes was a lawful and just disposition within their competency. But now in view of other great wars, with great generosity, the United States has extended the system of bounty to its soldiers and has extended its grants of homesteads, and swamp lands and railway grants for all these purposes, the temptation is so great that it would be very convenient to these States to relieve their people from taxation for ten years to come by taxing all the people of the United States to raise money by bonds or otherwise to put into their treasuries. I am not for it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President, I had not proposed to take any further part in this discussion, and I am very much disposed now to apologize to the Senate for doing so; but some things have escaped from the Senator from Vermont that I cannot feel justified in allowing to pass unnoticed. He has alluded to this bill and the action of the Senators from the States named in the bill, in two lights.

First, in his opening remarks the Senator spoke of the application now made as being in the nature of asking an alms, a gratuity. I do not give his words but his idea. I replied to that some days ago. We ask no alms of Vermont or any other State. We ask no gratuity. We ask what we believe to be justice and law; not that justice or law that sticks in the bark, but that broad justice which operates between one square man and another square man.

The Senator has also spoken of this in another light, as a kind of grab, and he spoke of the States that had shares in the pool. Does he wish to be understood that his opposition to this bill is because Vermont has no share in the grant, no part in the pool? If he does not mean that, what does he mean, I should be glad to know, by speaking in the way he has done in regard to this matter?

I have no reply to make to that statement other than this: if the votes of the Senator from Vermont are controlled solely by the question whether or not his State has a share in any money to be appropriated by Congress, and he will vote against a measure if she has not, I have formed a very mistaken judgment heretofore of the Senator from Vermont. I hope Senators of the United States are governed by higher considerations than those in their action here, and I shall continue to hope so, and shall look upon these offensive allusions by that Senator as something that occurred in the heat of debate, that were thrown in perhaps as a kind of make-weight to defeat a measure that he thinks ought to be defeated.

I will now submit a few brief remarks upon the merits of the bill. The Senator has again dwelt upon the lapse of time. He has said that Iowa has been derelict; that forty years perhaps have elapsed since some of the States should have made their claim. It struck me when the Senator was arguing that way that he might be putting in a caveat against a possible contingency in the future in regard to some of the older States. How long ago was it that some thirty-eight or forty millions of dollars of surplus revenue were distributed among the older States? It was about 1838, was it not?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. In 1836.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It struck me that possibly the Senator from Vermont was fearing that there might be a movement made here to recall that money. It is to be paid back when called for by the General Government. Perhaps he was placing himself upon ground where he could say that by a failure within a reasonable time on the part of the General Government to make the call the Government lost the right to have the money returned. I do not know whether that is what the Senator meant or not; but if the State of Iowa, having laid by for two years before the war, and then during the war, has lost her right to make this claim, if she has a good one, it strikes me that possibly the Government of the United States may be in danger of having the statute of limitations by reason of lapse of time pleaded against her if now she should seek to reclaim the thirty-eight or forty million dollars distributed among the older States, and to which the Senator from Vermont has not once alluded during this entire discussion.

The Senator insists upon it as a naked legal proposition that the case of none of these States has any leg to stand upon. He says that before the time when Iowa was admitted into the Union, for instance, the Government had issued bounty land warrants and had sold her lands for money, and that because she had sold her lands for money and had also issued bounty land warrants, therefore Iowa ought to have known that the Government intended in the future to dispose of her lands in the same way, and if the Government did so dispose of them in the same way we should have no claim upon the sections she disposed of for bounty land warrants. Let me suppose a case. I will suppose, for the sake of the argument, that I have ten thousand acres of unsold land; I wish I had. I will suppose that I have had much more than that, part of which I have sold and part of which I have given away, but I have ten thousand acres remaining. By an agreement with the Senator from Vermont I make a compact with him (Attorney-General Wirt called this a compact, I believe) that I will pay him a certain percentage upon the proceeds of the sale of the ten thousand acres that I have left. The Senator's argument is that because before I made that bargain with him I had been giving away land, I can continue to do so, although I have made a bargain with him that for what I sell of that land I will pay him a certain percentage upon the sale. It seems to me the Senator would complain of that. It seems to me that he would say to me, "You have a perfect right to sell that land, you have a right to fix the price of it, and you have the right to give it away if you please; yet you have given me an interest in that land by the agreement you have made with me, and whether you sell it for money at one price or another price, or whether you give it away to serve your own purposes in another way, my interest in it cannot be defeated without my consent."

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose a farmer had made a compact with a child in regard to the sale of the vegetables on the farm to give him a certain share of the vegetables sold from the farm, and the farmer would claim that all the vegetables had been sold to support the family, would he be obliged to give his son a share of the proceeds?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. No; but if the farmer, after providing for his family and selling a portion of the vegetables, should give away, to suit his own purposes, another portion which was neither used in the family nor sold, I think the son would have a right to ask compensation.

Mr. HOAR. Although he gave it to that very son?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am not arguing that part of the question now; I will come to it. That brings me directly to a matter that has made a figure in this discussion—the subject of equality—although the Senator from Vermont himself expressly said it had nothing to do with it whatever.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I said it had not anything to do with the construction of the statute.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Exactly so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the subject of equality had been pressed in debate by the Senator from Indiana who said it was not a fair thing that these States had been deprived of the whole of the benefits that they expected to receive. The answer was, "You have received a thousand times the benefit that you expected to get, even if we take your construction of the law, if we had kept these lands."

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The Senator from Vermont dealt with me a little curtly while he was speaking. I do not propose to deal so with him, although his mode of dealing with me would perhaps lead me to do so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg my friend's pardon for interrupting him; I will take my turn afterward.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Let us look at that point. The Senator says that Iowa, for instance, received lands for various purposes, for railroad purposes. She did. I said the other day that we had no claim to that money? Why? Because the remainder of the lands not granted had been sold for the full price that all the lands would have brought if the grant had not been made. The reserved lands were doubled in price immediately upon the grant being made, and on the proceeds of the sales of the reserved lands we received the 5 per cent. to which we were entitled. Again, when grants were made to us for particular purposes, for educational and other purpose, Iowa received the 5 per cent. We never had any interest in these lands beyond the one-twentieth of them, 5 per cent., and when the Government gave to us the whole twenty-twentieths, it seemed to me we had received all we were entitled to, and therefore we are not fairly entitled to it again.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to make a suggestion right there in reference to the illustration made by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR?] I ask whether the Government of the United States can require the States to comply with their agreement under the contract or law authorizing them to come into the Union and at the same time decline to carry out its contract with reference to these lands?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It is always one of the attributes of sovereignty that it can decline to do what it ought to do, and there is no way of compelling it to do other than by appealing to its sense of justice or to its sense of fear. We do not propose to appeal to its sense of fear, but we do propose to appeal to its sense of justice.

Now, let us go back a little while to the railroad grants. The Senator from Vermont has said a good deal about the generosity of the General Government to the State of Iowa, for instance in making the railroad land grants. Let me illustrate my idea about those grants. In an early day in Iowa, not very long ago—twenty or twenty-five years ago—we had what we have not now, not, at least, to the extent we had then, persons engaged in speculating in lands. One mode of speculation was for a person to buy up a section of land near what he hoped would be the place where the county seat of a county would be located. He would get a beautiful little map made of it, and upon that map he would lay out a handsome square in the center of the proposed town for a court-house if the county seat should be located there, or for a park, and he would lay off in different parts of the town two, three, four, six, or eight lots for school-house lots. Then he would mark off upon the plat a lot for each Christian denomination excepting Ingersoll's, I believe; and he would also grant a lot for a jail, perhaps one for a blacksmith's shop, and one for a shoemaker's shop, to be given away. What was his purpose? His purpose was to bring settlers first and then purchasers for his lots; and successful experiments of that kind have been made and towns have been built up in that way, and the man who entered into the speculation made a successful investment. If the Senator from Vermont were here, as he is not, I would ask him when he heard a man who had made an enterprise of this kind boasting afterward of how successful it had been, whether or not he would agree with the man that he had made a successful enterprise. He would say doubtless that he had and would commend his judgment and sound sense in being liberal, as he was, in laying off these lots in the town for public purposes. If, after commending him for his enterprise, the man should come to him and claim a great deal of credit for his generosity, "See how public spirited I was in donating a lot here for a park or a court-house; see how public spirited I was in donating a lot for a school-house in each corner of the town, in donating a lot for each church, and in donating a lot for a jail, for a blacksmith's shop and for a shoemaker's shop," I do not think the Senator from Vermont would agree that the man had been very generous. He was consulting his own interest in doing what he did and nothing else than that, and he served his own interests precisely in doing it.

So in the case of the relations of these lands to the State of Iowa—I speak of that State only—the Government has not lost a cent by it. She got for the lands she reserved dollar for dollar, every dollar she would have had if she had not offered any of them as donations for railroads, and she got the proceeds into her Treasury much sooner than she would have done if she had not given land in that way. By giving it States have been built up that we all have reason to be proud of. Now, when dollar for dollar of the money was gotten into the Treasury for the land, when it was got there sooner than it would have been if the grant had not been made, when the enterprise has turned out entirely successful in this case as in the other in the building up of that which is to a large extent the strength and wealth of this nation, it seems to me rather ill grace to talk about a matter of generosity. Nominally the State of Iowa got these lands. She did not get an acre of them until a corporation had been made all ready to receive the lands when granted. If I am not sadly mistaken it was not through the solicitation of the State of Iowa, but through the operations of the men composing these corporations that the grants were made to the State, and they passed through the hands of the State into the hands of the corporation, and the corporators do not live in Iowa. The people of the State of Iowa have given of their money over $10,000,000 as a gift. I do not say that it was not done through the application of Iowa; Iowa sought to have it done; but the moving power that had it done did not come from Iowa, or else I am sadly mistaken.

Mr. LOGAN. From Vermont?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I do not know where it came from, nor do I care. The lands passed through the State of Iowa to this corporation, and with them passed millions of our moneys donated by ourselves to support the corporation. The ordinary mode of building a railroad in Iowa when I went there was to require the localities through which it went to grade, bridge, and to tie the road. That was the rule. Either in bonds, or in subscriptions of stock, or by taxation, we had to raise enough money to grade and bridge and tie the road; and when that had been done the franchise, the grading, bridging, tying, railroad lands and all were mortgaged to somebody who furnished the money to put the rails and the rolling stock on; and after that came the freezing out process by which everything but the lien vanished. Therefore I do not deem that in making these railroad grants to the Northwestern States the United States was merely generous to them; it was engaged in what I believe to be the best-paying enterprise this Government has entered upon. It has paid this nation better than any other land enterprise at least that it has undertaken since we have had a government. Will the Senator from Vermont be kind enough to pass me that map?

Mr. EDMUNDS. With pleasure. [The map was handed.]

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should be glad to know—I cannot know, I only guess—as to the impression left in the minds of Senators by the remark of the Senator from Vermont with reference to the amount of lands covered by the land grants to the State of Iowa. He exhibited a map here, from which I understood him to say that the State of Iowa, except a very narrow margin upon its southern border and a very narrow margin upon its northern border, amounting perhaps to one-twentieth of the whole, was covered by land grants. That would convey to the mind of a person not familiar with the facts the idea that lands all over the State of Iowa within those limits went for these purposes. What was the fact about it? The land warrants that were used so extensively in Iowa to locate lands were authorized in 1847 and issued immediately afterward. The land grant was made in 1856. The warrants had been in circulation from 1847 down to 1856. I remember perfectly well in 1853, when I first went to the State of Iowa, there was a land office in the town where I lived, and cues, I believe they called them—such as are formed about the ballot-box, or where the 4 per cent. certificates were sold last year—were formed. Men stood all night on the stairs leading to the land office, to be there first in the morning, their pockets crowded with these warrants, and when daylight came those who had not pluck enough to stand there during the night in order to get in first, formed a line one after another, as is sometimes done at the post-office at Leadville and other places out there, in strings of fifteen, twenty, forty, or fifty men, each taking his turn to get into the land office and get his piece of land. That was the case at Iowa City, at Des Moines, at Council Bluffs, at Fairfield, at Osage, at Fort Dodge, at Sioux City, and perhaps elsewhere in our State for years. For years the lands were entered up by means of these warrants, until, at the time when the railroad grants were made, although they extended upon paper from the Mississippi River to the Missouri River, they extended over a great deal of country in which there was no land to be had to give, because it all belonged to private individuals.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then you got the indemnity land.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Of course we have got the indemnity for that, and we do not ask it over again; but I was endeavoring to show to the Senate how wrongly a right-minded man, like the Senator from Vermont is, can impress upon the Senate for the fact that which is not the fact when he does not understand the matter which he is talking about. I think in 1857 the land office in Iowa City went out of existence because there were no more lands to enter there, either east or west or north or south of it. In the western part of the State of Iowa these land grants did cover a considerable quantity of land, but in the eastern portion very little, and in the central portion of it but a small proportion of the lands. As the Senator from Vermont said, this has nothing to do with the question before the Senate; it is only dragged in here as a make-weight; it is brought in to prejudice the case and not to elucidate it.

I do not know, Mr. President, that I care to say anything more on this subject. I should not have said a word to-day, had it not been that I thought the Senator from Vermont in speaking of this matter had spoken in terms that required something to be said, and for that reason only I have said what I have said.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am sorry to detain the Senate for a single moment, but my honorable friend from Iowa, whom I so much respect, has evidently misunderstood me as seeming, as he thinks, to evince some hostility to the State of Iowa or to any other State. That is an entire mistake. But when these States ask to be measured in the scale they must not object if the proper weights are put in on the other side, because that is fair play as it appears to me; and all that I said in respect of the grants to these States was in answer to the argument of the Senator from Indiana and others. Even as to the Senator's colleague, when I asked him if he stood on the law alone, I could not bring him down to that point. He relied entirely on the general issue. Now, on the general issue according to the illustration of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] that was so happy, a father with his children, as all the people are the children of the United States, made a bargain to give the net proceeds of the sales of the vegetables to one son or to any son who should marry; and there were other sons and daughters who did not marry or other sons and daughters who went to the war or who were poor and miserable or for any reason needed something as the father thought, or as the family council thought—which would be the better way of stating it, which is the French law—the family council, which is composed of all the States, thought they should have something. Then the net-proceeds boy comes in and says, "Here, you have given a part of these vegetables to my starving brother, you have given a part of these vegetables to the children of another brother who was killed in the war, and there are not as many net proceeds as I thought there were going to be; now pay them over to me." What sort of a case would that be? That is all as to that.

Now, as to the land grants; the argument was that these States had not been on the whole justly treated, that they had not got on the whole what might have been expected from the Government of the United States out of their acts of admission, that is, 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of sales, because the sales had been so much less than it was expected they would be. Then the answer is, why are they less? As to Iowa, it is because in reponse to resolutions of your own Legislature, and on bills introduced by your own Senators and Representatives forming a part of this national family council, you have taken the lands for objects that you think, while they are good for all of us, are specially good for you, and you know you turn around and say, "Give us the 5 per cent. besides." I say you have been on the whole fairly and generously dealt with.

Mr. President, that argument will not wash, as anybody can see, and that is all I meant. And far be it from me to impute to the people of Iowa anything dishonorable or disreputable. I know enough of them, although I was never in the State, not to suggest anything of that kind. Now, let us see how the matter stands as to Iowa for a single moment; I will not go into the law of the matter any more.

I find that the State of Iowa has had 3,449,728 acres of swamp lands, although, as was said to me the other day by an eminent citizen of Iowa, and I believe it, there is not one-fiftieth part of that three and a half million acres that was in any just sense swamp lands at all, but they are aggregated in that way, turned over to this State as a free gift, as I look at it; and yet on the compact as it stood, as it is construed by the Senators from Iowa those lands ought to have been sold and there ought to have been 5 per cent. of the net proceeds paid over to the State, and the report of this committee states in print that the swamp lands fall within the same principle. I should think not. If the theory was that all the lands should be sold and net proceeds obtained from them, why did you not sell them? The answer is we have given them to the very State, a hundred times over what the 5 per cent. would be.

Now, let us go along from the swamp lands till we come to concessions. The State of Iowa has had by grant 3,941,273 acres of land granted to that State and to corporations in it, but chiefly to the State in aid of corporations that she might herself select,—about four million acres of lands, and lands that the United States parted with, as the Senator argues, for a consideration. A consideration means money, and therefore if it means money there should be 5 per cent. upon it. And yet the State has got the lands. It is just as was stated in one of these resolutions here in the very year that we have been speaking about. I happen to have it:

Memorial to Congress for a grant of land in aid of the construction of the McGregor, St. Peters and Missouri River Railroad.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Your memorialists, the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, respectfully represent to your honorable body that energetic efforts are being made by the above-named company for the construction of a road commencing at McGregor, in said State, at a point opposite the terminus of the Milwaukee and Mississippi Railroad, (which is now completed across the State of Wisconsin,) and running thence west to the Missouri River; that the route is eminently adapted to the advantageous construction of a work of this character; that it is one of the great natural lines of projected railroads commencing between the East and West; that under the donation of lands made by Congress to said State the northern portion received no benefit therefrom, and your memorialists—

That is the sovereign power of the State of Iowa, its Legislature—believing that the construction of said road would greatly facilitate the settlement, and add largely to the wealth of the northern portion of said State, ask that a donation of land lying within the State may be made to aid in its construction.

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives be requested to use their influence to procure from the General Government a donation of every alternate section, equal to three miles in width, on each side of said road, to be given to said company on such terms as in the opinion of the Legislature of this State may be just and reasonable.

That is merely a sample of the constant applications by the Legislatures of these States; and I only take that not as invidious against Iowa—by no means—but, as Iowa is among the most cultivated and intelligent of the people of the Northwest, as illustrating the true grounds upon which these lands have been taken out from the common fund that Virginia gave them to, for the benefit, as they put it themselves, primarily of the people of their own States, and secondarily, as it always is, for the benefit of all, because no State can prosper upon any ground of equal personal rights and the administration of justice that does not add in a degree to the prosperity of the whole. That is where the mischief is, Mr. President. Nobody can contend, I repeat, and I hope for the last time, that on the principles of law, if a suit had been brought in the Court of Claims as it could have been for twenty-five years last past, there would have been a ghost of a chance of a recovery of a single dollar, because the law as it stands does not warrant it; and that is why the governor of Iowa, instructed by his Legislature to bring suit in the Court of Claims, after hearing the grounds on which the Secretary of the Interior resisted the claim, abstained from bringing the suit. There is no ground, therefore, in point of law; or if there be, the law is ample and adequate to it.

Then the only ground is the general one that the junior Senator from Iowa—junior in point of years, I have forgotten which is the junior in point of service—put it upon, that the State has not got as much money as it would have got if we had made no further provisions for bounty lands or railroad land grants or agricultural colleges after the State came in, and had sold all our domain there although the land in that State was devoted on the solemn memorial of its Legislature to objects that she desired it might be devoted to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY in the chair.) The question is on the indefinite postponement of the bill, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this subject with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay" on this motion.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) The Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] being unwell, has left the Chamber, and I am paired with him on this question. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay" on this motion.

Mr. PENDLETON, (when his name was called.) I have paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY.] If he were here, I should vote "nay" and he would vote "yea."

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) While I was temporarily absent a while ago, I understand that my colleague paired me with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.] I respect that pair, and shall not vote.

Mr. RANSOM, (when the name of Mr. VANCE was called.) My colleague [Mr. VANCE] is paired on this question with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. GROVER.] My colleague, if here, would vote "yea" and the Senator from Oregon would vote "nay."

Mr. WITHERS, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] The Senator from Kansas, if present, would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

I will also announce that my colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.] My colleague would vote "yea" and the Senator from South Carolina would vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to announce the pair of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GROOME] with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. BRUCE.]

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Anthony,	Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Pryor,
Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Hoar,	Randolph,
Beck,	Dawes,	Kernan,	Ransom,
Blair,	Eaton,	McPherson,	Rollins,
Booth,	Edmunds,	Maxey,	Saulsbury,
Burnside,	Farley,	Morgan,	Wallace,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hampton,	Plumb,	Williams.

NAYS—21.

Allison,	Ferry,	McDonald,	Voorhees,
Baldwin,	Jonas,	Paddock,	Walker,
Call,	Jones of Florida,	Sharon,	Windom.
Cameron of Wis.,	Kirkwood,	Teller,
Cockrell,	Lamar,	Thurman,
Davis of Illinois,	Logan,	Vest,

ABSENT—27.

Bayley,	Gordon,	Ingalls,	Platt,
Blaine,	Groome,	Johnston,	Saunders,
Bruce,	Grover,	Jones of Nevada,	Slater,
Butler,	Hamlin,	Kellogg,	Vance,
Carpenter,	Harris,	McMillan,	Whyte,
Conkling,	Hereford,	Morrill,	Withers.
Garland,	Hill of Colorado,	Pendleton,

So the motion to indefinitely postpone the bill was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I give notice of a motion to reconsider.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President—

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator from New Jersey will wait a moment. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] gives notice of a motion to reconsider. I move to reconsider this vote now. I want to make an end of this business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont moves to reconsider the vote by which this bill was indefinitely postponed. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Several SENATORS. Not to night.

Mr. TELLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. RANDOLPH. One moment. I gave way to the Senator from Vermont. I did not give up the floor. I gave way to the Senator from Vermont to make a statement, and pending that statement the Senator from Colorado makes a motion to adjourn. Before the motion for adjournment is put, I want simply to give notice that upon the completion of this bill as by previous understanding, that is after the morning hour of the next business day has expired, I shall bring up the case of General Porter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We can finish this in a minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senate will not adjourn until we finish this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EATON called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired, as before stated, with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE,] or I should vote "yea" on this motion.

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired on all questions affecting this bill with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.] I suppose this question is indirectly involved in it.

Mr. WITHERS, (when his name was called.) I am paired, as I announced previously, with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PADDOCK. My colleague [Mr. SAUNDERS] is paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.]

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Allison,	Jones of Florida,	Pendleton,	Vest,
Cameron of Wis.,	Kirkwood,	Plumb,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Lamar,	Ransom,	Walker,
Coke,	Logan,	Sharon,	Windom.
Davis of Illinois,	McDonald,	Teller,
Jonas,	Paddock,	Thurman,

NAYS—25.

Bayard,	Dawes,	Hoar,	Rollins,
Beck,	Eaton,	Kernan,	Saulsbury,
Blair,	Edmunds,	McPherson,	Wallace,
Booth,	Farley,	Maxey,	Williams.
Burnside,	Ferry,	Morgan,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hampton,	Pryor,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Randolph,

ABSENT—29.

Anthony,	Conkling,	Hill of Colorado,	Saunders,
Bailey,	Garland,	Ingalls,	Slater,
Baldwin,	Gordon,	Johnston,	Vance,
Blaine,	Groome,	Jones of Nevada,	Whyte,
Bruce,	Grover,	Kellogg,	Withers.
Butler,	Hamlin,	McMillan,
Call,	Harris,	Morrill,
Carpenter,	Hereford,	Platt,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not propose, at this late hour of the day, to discuss this bill. I simply desire to call the attention of the Senate to the manner in which it has been discussed by its opponents.

Since I have been in the Senate, which of course is but a short time, I have seen no bill presented to the Senate and have heard no discussion upon any public measure that seemed to me to be so offensive in manner as the discussion of this bill. Offensive I think I may say without violating any rules of decorum or debate, because in every speech that has been made, as I recollect—or nearly every speech, (there may be some honorable exceptions)—Senators who were supposed to favor this bill, if they have not been directly charged with favoring it because of the pecuniary interest of their States, have been at least subjected to that implication. Notably has that been the case in the speech of the Senator from Vermont, and notably has it been so in every speech of any considerable length that has been made on this subject. It struck me, as one somewhat unacquainted with debate in this Chamber, as an extremely remarkable thing that Senators here who come to vote upon a question that all admit involves a construction of doubtful statutes, cannot vote upon it as they would upon any other bill without having their motives impugned.

It is said that it takes from the Treasury of the United States a large amount of money, $4,000,000 says one Senator; another Senator on the opposite side, holding that the bill ought not to pass, says $10,000,000. Mr. President is that any reason why the bill should not pass if it is an honest bill? If the States that are named in this bill are entitled to the money by virtue of the statutes under which they were admitted, is it any reason why we should vote against the bill that it covers a large amount of money or a small amount of money? Is justice to be measured out in the United States Senate by the amount, by the consideration? I say the discussion of it is offensive when it imputes to Senators motives of this kind. It is offensive, in my judgment, when it is put upon the ground that it ought not to pass because the amount is large. It is offensive in other views.

It so happens that the great majority of the States mentioned in this bill are States that are termed Western States, and we have heard allusions this afternoon in debate here calculated to speak with disrespect of the western section. I need not refer to them. We have heard one Senator say he had fallen into the western way of expressing things, as if it was an untruthful way the western people had.

Now, Mr. President, I come to vote for this bill. I voted against its postponement; I intended to vote for its passage, though the State of Colorado, that I in part represent on this floor, is interested with the State of Vermont in defeating this bill, when our pecuniary interests are against this bill and not for it, when no man can figure under a fair construction of the bill that the State of Colorado would get under the bill more than $700 or $800, a contemptible sum to the Senators from that State individually, contemptible to the people of that State who deal in somewhat larger numbers and with larger amounts.

I must say that I was a little restive under this repeated declaration of Senators that we were instigated and moved to vote on this bill by pecuniary interests, and I did think it was fair and right that I should have an opportunity at some time in the course of the debate at least to say that the Senators from Colorado were voting upon principle, and not upon pecuniary considerations.

I thought that we had discussed this bill fairly up to this point. I believe there were some other considerations that might have been presented, which if the time would allow I would present; but I do not propose to do it. It is evidently the opinion of the Senate that this bill ought not to pass. I am prepared to bow to the will of the Senate, and I am not one who will say that the Senators who voted against this bill are disposed to vote against it because they want to save money that rightfully belongs to us. I will admit, and I will never be heard to say otherwise, that they believe that honestly it does not belong to these States, and that they have voted honestly, as I claim that I have voted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I will not take a minute. I want to disabuse the mind of my friend from Colorado, who knows that I respect him very much, in regard to anything I have said, and I think I can speak for all other Senators who have opposed this bill, of any imputation upon the motives of a single Senator. There has been nothing intentionally offensive, and I am sure nothing has been said that anybody except somebody who supposed that his motives might be suspected would regard as offensive.

I have read from the letter of the governor of Iowa, that called to the attention of a Secretary of the Interior the fact that his State was interested the same as Iowa was, as a thing that was not to be forgotten in considering the question, not to be forgotten in the sense of implying impartiality; that is all; and I have tried to say, and I repeat that I have no doubt every Senator who votes for this bill votes for it on grounds that are entirely beyond any gain that his State is supposed to make by it. That is all I wish to say, sir.

Mr. McDONALD. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate adjourn.

The question being put, a division was called for.

Mr. EATON. We may as well have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

A division being had, there were—22 yeas and 19 noes.

Mr. EATON and Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when his name was called.) The Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNSIDE,] desiring to be absent for a little while, I am paired with him, and so I refrain from voting on this question unless it is necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] with the right reserved to vote if it is necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. WINDOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WITHERS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] If I were not paired, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to state that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] is paired on this question with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.]

Mr. PADDOCK. My colleague [Mr. SAUNDERS] is paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.] My colleague, if here, would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Baldwin,	Jones of Florida,	Plumb,	Vest,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to reconsider the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I went to the Clerk's desk a moment ago and examined the vote on the question of indefinite postponement, and I must say that there is a condition of things represented by that vote in the Senate to-night which has never appeared on the Calendar of the Senate before. It was argued the other day by two Senators, highly honorable gentlemen from the State of Alabama, that their State would not receive by the passage of this bill more than would be paid by it in taxation. The honorable Senator from Vermont but a few days ago indicated the same thing to the Senate. Strange to say, it has been followed out strictly by the votes as announced here in the Senate to-night.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is mistaken as to anything I have said about it.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not mistaken, sir. The Senator from Vermont appealed to men in the Senate Chamber that their States would be taxed to pay a part of this appropriation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So will all the States. I did not speak of any particular State. Every State is taxed.

Mr. LOGAN. I say that the appeal which was made here in reference to this question is of a different character from what is usual in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So far as the Senator refers to me, I should be glad to have him read any part of my remarks that he bases that statement upon; and they have not been doctored, the Senator may be sure.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; not at all. I do not say they have been. The Senator will not deny that he stated in his argument that the States would be taxed for the payment of this appropriation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course I say that all States must be taxed to pay it. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. LOGAN. I say here to-night that that was an unfair argument before the Senate of the United States. It was appealing to the constituencies of certain Senators to arouse their prejudices against their being taxed for that which would be just to the other States, and not a vote has been recorded for this bill or against its indefinite postponement except by Senators from the States that are to receive benefits with one or two exceptions, showing that gentlemen from States not receiving benefits under this bill voted because they believed their constituency would be taxed for the purpose of paying this appropriation.

The whole argument that has been made here on the floor of the Senate has been for the purpose of prejudicing the minds of Senators against the claim of these States, appealing to them, as I have said, by the Senator from Vermont and the Senators from Alabama, from the fact that they were not to get a part of the grab, as the Senator from Vermont denounced it on one or two occasions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not any. You cannot find that word on any occasion.

Mr. MORGAN. I stated to the Senate that as a matter of fact under this bill Alabama would receive less than the amount she would have to pay. I referred to that to show that I was not interested, but was an impartial judge in the premises. I endeavored to put myself in that attitude before the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not say that the Senator took any other position; but he did take exactly the position that his State would not receive more than she would pay out, and therefore he would consider the question as to whether he would support this bill or not. I said that that character of argument went upon the precise basis that if a Senator's State did not receive a part of the benefit, he should vote against a bill. Sir, I announce here to-night that a proposition of that kind is not in accordance with justice, is not in accordance with fair dealing, is not in accordance with the equality of the States, but is in accordance with a desire to represent a State alone, disconnected from all the other States belonging to this great nationality. It is on the ground that only a man's own constituency shall be represented according to the amount they shall receive or the amount they shall pay out and not in accordance with the justice or the right which belongs to States or individuals. I said that the other day; I repeat it now; and to my friend from Vermont I assert here without the fear of contradiction that no claim has ever come before Congress based upon anything like the justice upon which this claim has been based, belonging to a New England State, which has not received the approbation of every Senator from that part of this great Union.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator can refer to any claim on the part of a New England State—and the only one that I know of was the Maine performance about interest—that I voted for, either he or I must be very much mistaken.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well, I assert to-night that whenever a Southern State or a New England State has asked the Senate or the Congress of the United States to keep the faith of this country, it has always been awarded and has always been voted. In the Senate Chamber but a few years ago, interest amounting to $600,000 was paid to the State of Maine for expenditures in the revolutionary war—

Mr. McDONALD. The northeastern boundary.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well, the northeastern boundary. I beg pardon, and I thank the gentleman for the correction.

Mr. THURMAN. I beg to correct my friend yet; that was for Massachusetts' computation of interest on the war debt of 1812.

Mr. LOGAN. I so understood it and I will state it as I understand it. Massachusetts had computed her interest on the war debt of 1812 at a certain amount, and had transferred it to a railroad company belonging to the State of Maine; and under the lead of Senator Sumner, of Massachusetts, that claim was voted by the Senate and by the House of Representatives. That is the way I understand the case.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly I will.

Mr. DAWES. I think the Senator from Indiana with greater accuracy than anybody else can state how much it amounted to, because it was paid to Indiana people.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts, inasmuch as he desires to state the proposition—he certainly ought to know it for he was a Representative from that State at the time—please state the facts to the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. What facts?

Mr. LOGAN. In reference to this claim.

Mr. DAWES. I state the fact that Massachusetts had a claim, which belonged in part to the State of Massachusetts and in part to the State of Maine; that the State of Massachusetts gave away her interest in it to Maine, and Maine gave it to some contractors in Indiana who said they would run the risk of getting it through Congress and build a railroad with it.

Mr. LOGAN. What was the claim, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. McDONALD. I ask the Senator what contractors he refers to?

Mr. LOGAN. I asked the Senator from Massachusetts what was the claim. Was it not for interest on the war debt of 1812?

Mr. DAWES. I think it was, but I am not very certain.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. DAWES. I will state that I think the Senator is correct. I did not take very great interest in it.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not state that the Senator did. I only wanted to get at the facts.

Mr. DAWES. The matter was taken charge of by some enterprising western men.

Mr. LOGAN. No matter who the men were. The point is that Massachusetts charged interest on her war debt of 1812, and she transferred it to certain contractors and they got the money. No State since the organization of this Government ever made such a claim before, and yet Congress voted it. So I say, too, in reference to the State of Alabama—

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator say that no State ever made such a claim?

Mr. LOGAN. No State that I ever heard of.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator very well qualifies his statement in that manner. Nobody of course can correct him if he has never heard of it.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator mention some other State that had such a claim?

Mr. DAWES. The State of Maryland.

Mr. LOGAN. What did the State of Maryland do?

Mr. DAWES. Precisely what the State of Massachusetts following did. This was in the name of the State of Massachusetts, but Massachusetts had no more interest in it than anybody else.

Mr. LOGAN. We are not talking about the interest, but about the fact.

Mr. DAWES. The fact that after the State of Maryland and several other States procured an act of Congress fixing a mode of casting the interest on their debt, it occurred to that part of Massachusetts formerly which is now the State of Maine, that they ought to have theirs calculated in the same way, and they came to the State of Massachusetts and Massachusetts told them they might have what they could get out of it, and they transferred it to some contractors in the West, and they, having more enterprise in and about Washington than there ever was in the State of Massachusetts, got that through Congress which Massachusetts had never been able to get through.

Mr. LOGAN. They got it through Congress. The Senator says the State of Maryland made the precedent. I fail to see that the State of Maryland has not voted with the State of Massachusetts against the claim of Illinois to-day. The State of Maryland then computed the interest on her war debt and got it through Congress. The State of Massachusetts followed, and the Senator who then occupied the seat which the gentleman now occupies championed the bill from Massachusetts. I remember it well, and it passed Congress. The States seldom have asked for interest on war claims. But, forsooth, when the Northwest comes and asks you to give us that which you agreed to do when we became a part of this Government, you say "We do not get any part of the grab." Oh, statesmanship stands high to-day! The statesmanship of Webster and Clay and the great men who preceded us always taught the doctrine in the Senate Chamber that justice was the great principle running through all laws and all compacts and all agreements, and that the Government should keep its faith with the States as well as with the citizens. But we have fallen upon degenerate times. We have fallen upon such times that the Senators from Massachusetts will take interest on a war debt for their State and deny the execution of a contract between the Government and my State because my State gets a small pittance and their State gets no division of it!

Sir, that is the principle that guides and moves this Senate in this particular question to-day. Disguise it as you will, it is the fact patent before the country that every State save one that gets no part of this appropriation votes against the bill upon the principle enunciated by the Senator from Vermont that the States are to be taxed to pay an honest contract and an honest debt. And the same principle enunciated and followed by the Senators from Alabama, on which one Senator calculates that $70,000 will be received, and perhaps not any less than that will be paid out in taxes.

Sir, let me say to that Senator, rich as he is in the great storehouse of legal lore which he has accumulated in his life-time, that he himself upon this floor enunciates the doctrine "unless I get ten cents I do not vote five."

Sir, if there is anything on the top of this earth that is small, that is pitiable, that is to be looked upon as less than other things, it is the idea that a man claiming to be a statesman will refuse justice to one State because his own State does not get a part. Alabama, after receiving $120,000 on the same principle that the State of Illinois asks this pittance to-day, after she has received it, receipted for it, and put it in her pocket, comes forward and says, "I cannot vote for Illinois." Why? "Because I have got all that I claimed, and do not get a divide of what you claim."

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator from Illinois intend to say that I or my colleague made such a statement as that on this floor?

Mr. LOGAN. I say that your colleague summed up in his speech the amount his State would receive in interest on these certificates, and stated that it was less than his State would have to pay.

Mr. MORGAN. My colleague made that statement?

Mr. LOGAN. That is what he stated.

Mr. MORGAN. And I made a similar statement for the purpose of showing that we were entirely disinterested on this question, and therefore could afford without partiality to apply to the question our own conviction of the law of the land. We have a right to our conviction.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course I admit that.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Illinois cannot suppose that we propose to exculpate him entirely for the manner in which he charges on other States when he is to pocket a large amount of money by this bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I am, myself?

Mr. MORGAN. No, I mean your State.

Mr. LOGAN. Oh! When I said that the Senator from Alabama made a statement that his State would not receive the amount it would pay out, I stated a fact as the RECORD shows. I am entitled to come to the conclusion that the Senator voted against this bill because his State did not receive more than his State would pay out.

Mr. MORGAN. I have this to say to the Senator: if he is entitled to come to that conclusion it is because he feels that the converse argument applies to himself.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; that may be the opinion of the Senator from Alabama. The Senator from Alabama who has just taken his seat—if I quote him incorrectly I hope he will correct me—said in his argument that his State was not interested because it would not receive more than it would pay out, and therefore he was led to examine this question in a certain light. Did he not say that?

Mr. MORGAN. I said I examined it with entire impartiality.

Mr. LOGAN. Did the Senator not say that because his State did not receive more than it would pay out he considered himself in the examination of this question in a different light from other Senators? Did he not say that?

Mr. MORGAN. My remarks are on record.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well, sir. I assert that he said that in substance, and I replied to it in the same manner, not with any feeling; because I insisted that the principle by which these gentlemen were governed was not the true theory which ought to govern Senators in reference to questions that come before this Senate. I applied the same rule to the Senator from Vermont when I said to that Senator, and I say it now, that with all his legal lore, with all his astuteness, with all his ability, with all his greatness, he yet fell far below the mark of a statesman when he appealed to Senators in this Chamber to vote against this bill because their States would be taxed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not made any such appeal.

Mr. LOGAN. I say the Senator did make it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I say I did not.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. In the Senator's speech he said, appealing to these men, that their States would be taxed to pay the amount appropriated for the benefit of these States. Did not the Senator say that?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. What did the Senator say?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have just been looking over what I said the other day.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; I am ready to be corrected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is the first time I have read over my remarks. I have said only, as far as I can see here—and this is the thing that the Senator is observing about—that the common treasury of all the people had got to be taxed to pay this money, and we ought to be careful to see that it was justly due before we parted with the public money, of which we were only the trustees.

And while I am up I will say that the Senator from Iowa stated that I had called this a grab. I have looked through what I said the other day, and I am unable so far to find any such term or phrase.

Mr. McDONALD. I think that expression was used in reference to the acts passed for the relief of Alabama and Mississippi.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot find it even as to the case of Alabama and Mississippi.

Mr. McDONALD. The expression was used, I think, by the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If anybody will say that I used it, I shall be glad to have him turn to it. I have no recollection of using such a phrase. Of course nobody in an extemporaneous debate can remember afterward unless he reads the speeches (which I never do) exactly what he has said; but I have hunted through the report before me and I can find nothing of the kind applied to anybody, and I have said nothing on the subject of taxing States except the common proposition that I am quite willing to repeat, that it is our business to be careful how we pay money out of the Treasury of all the people to any one.

Mr. LOGAN. I agree to that. It is our business to be careful how we pay money out of the Treasury of the people to anybody; but, sir, when Vermont, a great State, as I agree it is so far as its production of men is concerned, appeals to the State of West Virginia, for instance, that compliments the nation by its ability, and to other States that vote against this appropriation, I say when Vermont appeals to these States that they shall be careful how they pay out the public treasure, what is meant? The meaning is "You are to understand that your constituents are to be taxed in order to comply with the contract made by the Government with some of the sister States."

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator, again unintentionally, I think, misrepresents me. I have not appealed to the Senators from West Virginia, or Alabama, or Georgia, or any other State. I have appealed to my honorable friend from Illinois, whom I respect and believe in, just as much as I have to any other Senator in everything that I have said.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not questioning the motives of the Senator at all.

Mr. McDONALD. Will the Senator from Illinois give way to allow me to move an adjournment?

Mr. LOGAN. It makes no difference to me.

Mr. McDONALD. I think we might as well adjourn and come back to-morrow morning in good humor. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. I do not want to interrupt the speech of the Senator from Illinois; but—

Mr. LOGAN. I am not making a speech. I am only stating a few facts.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to set him right at some time on a matter that he has referred to.

Mr. LOGAN. I am ready to hear the Senator from Massachusetts right now.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator has—

Mr. McDONALD. I thought the Senator from Illinois gave way to my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Did the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield to any one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 18, noes 18; no quorum voting.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And the motion is lost.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is lost.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the absent Senators be sent for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont moves that the absent Senators be sent for.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. Had you not better let me go on with my speech?

Mr. McDONALD. We do not know who are absent, Mr. President.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We know that we are not absent. I move that the roll be called. If there is not a quorum, that is probably the proper motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will direct the roll to be called. It does not require a motion.

The Secretary called the roll, and forty-five Senators answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call shows forty-five Senators present, a quorum.

Mr. McDONALD. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is already on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The motion to adjourn was lost on an equal division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana has repeated his motion that the Senate adjourn, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when his name was called.) Early in the evening I paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNSIDE,] and in view of the fact that this seems to be in the nature of a division on the line of this bill, I shall refrain from voting on the present motion.

Mr. WINDOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] If he were present, he would vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say that I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. PADDOCK. My colleague [Mr. SAUNDERS] is paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.]

Mr. BUTLER. I am paired on this question with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] and therefore do not vote.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] is paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.]

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. WALKER.] The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] is paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. McMILLAN.]

Mr. PADDOCK. The senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] is paired on all these votes with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG.]

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Call,	Jonas,	Paddock,	Thurman,
Cameron of Wis.,	Jones of Florida,	Plumb,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Kirkwood,	Ransom,	Voorhees.
Davis of Illinois,	Logan,	Sharon,
Gordon,	McDonald,	Teller,

NAYS—19.

Beck,	Eaton,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,
Blair,	Edmunds,	Hoar,	Pryor,
Booth,	Farley,	Kernan,	Rollins,
Davis of W. Va.,	Ferry,	McPherson,	Williams.
Dawes,	Hampton,	Maxey,

ABSENT—39.

Allison,	Carpenter,	Ingalls,	Saulsbury,
Anthony,	Coke,	Johnston,	Saunders,
Bailey,	Conkling,	Jones of Nevada,	Slaters,
Baldwin,	Garland,	Kellogg,	Vance,
Bayard,	Groome,	Lamar,	Walker,
Blaine,	Grover,	McMillan,	Wallace,
Bruce,	Hamlin,	Morrill,	Whyte,
Burnside,	Harris,	Pendleton,	Windom,
Butler,	Hereford,	Platt,	Withers.
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Colorado,	Randolph,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate declines to adjourn; but there is not a quorum voting. The Secretary will call the absentees.

Mr. ALLISON. Before that call begins, I want to say in justice to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] that I agreed to announce his pair when the vote should be taken; but it entirely slipped my memory. He is paired with the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG.] I wish the fact to appear upon the record that I omitted to state what I ought to have stated.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not ask any courtesy from the Senate more than I am entitled to nor more than any other Senator is entitled to. I only wish to say that I am not through with my remarks. I would prefer to continue them in the day-time, but if the Senate desire to stay here to-night and listen to me, I think I can entertain them for about six hours, and then my friend from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] perhaps for the rest of the night. If the Senate wish to accommodate themselves and adjourn, it is all right; if not, I shall send for my books and pamphlets and continue my argument, if the Senate desire to hear me.

Mr. EATON. If my friend will permit me to say a word, I will say that I think he had better send for his books and pamphlets and continue his argument, for I believe we ought to settle this matter to-night. I shall be very glad to hear my friend.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the absentees be called.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can only speak by unanimous consent.

Mr. LOGAN. I know that I am out of order, but I desire to make one remark in response to the Senator from Connecticut, if the Senate will permit me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to keep my friend from Connecticut up so late, because of all his party he is my choice for President, and I want to have him preserved in a proper way, so that he may administer the affairs of that office if he gets into it.

Mr. EATON. That is another evidence that the Senate should hear my friend from Illinois to-night. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the absentees.

The Secretary called the absentees, and eleven Senators answered to their names.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The absentees having been called, so that we know who are absent, I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not a debatable question.

Mr. THURMAN. I think the first thing in order is to report whether we have a quorum.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The result of the roll-call was announced, and the Secretary then called the absentees, as directed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A motion to adjourn was made pending a motion to send for absentees, and the motion to adjourn was rejected. The absentees have been already called, and my motion now is that the absentees be sent for.

Mr. THURMAN. But Senators have responded to the call of absentees. Are we not entitled to know whether we have a quorum?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That does not make any difference.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, it does.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote revealed the want of a quorum.

Mr. THURMAN. But the call of absentees may show that there is a quorum present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it does, we can send for the absentees just the same; it makes no difference.

Mr. THURMAN. It makes a world of difference, for if a quorum is present then any motion can be made in respect of this bill; anything can be done.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to suggest that the calling of the absentees involves the duty to report the result of that call, whatever effect it may have?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly it does.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair stated that there were twenty-eight Senators absent.

Mr. THURMAN. Is there a quorum present upon the call of the absentees?

Mr. RANSOM. Certainly there is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no quorum voting.

Mr. TELLER. There must be a quorum present if there are but twenty-eight absent Senators.

Mr. McDONALD. On the call of the yeas and nays and the call of the absentees together, is there a quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call of the yeas and nays revealed the lack of a quorum.

Mr. McDONALD. On the call of the absentees how many Senators responded?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There were twenty-eight Senators absent.

Mr. McDONALD. How many responded, being present in the Chamber?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote was 18 in the affirmative and 19 in the negative, no quorum voting. On the call of the absentees there were twenty-eight Senators absent, according to the call.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then there is a quorum present, because that is less than half the whole number.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That would appear.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that further proceedings upon the call be dispensed with.

Mr. THURMAN. No; the motion to adjourn is the pending question. I ask that the yeas and nays be called now on the motion to adjourn. The yeas and nays were ordered and no quorum voted, and upon the call of the absentees a quorum appears. Now I insist upon it that the matter before the Senate is to call the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is greatly mistaken. It is not important whether a quorum is present or not on a question of adjourning, and the motion to adjourn was lost. Then there was a call of the absentees, and that having been made, I moved that the absentees be sent for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair stated the result of the vote, that the motion to adjourn was lost, but the vote revealed the want of a quorum, and the absentees were called by direction of the Chair.

Mr. THURMAN. I move now that we adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate adjourn, which is in order.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 20, noes 20.

Mr. EATON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD.]

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.] If he were here, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. RANDOLPH, (when his name was called.) I vote "nay." I also wish to announce the pair of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] The Senator from Arkansas would vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. RANSOM, (when the name of Mr. VANCE was called.) As I have already stated, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. GROVER] and my colleague [Mr. VANCE] are paired on this question.

Mr. WINDOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]

The call of the roll was concluded.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. SAUNDERS] is paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.]

Mr. JONAS. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] is paired with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. GROVER.] The Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] is paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. WALKER.]

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My colleague [Mr. HEREFORD] is paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.]

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Baldwin,	Gordon,	Paddock,	Thurman,
Call,	Jonas,	Plumb,	Vest,
Cameron of Wis.,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,	Voorhees.
Cockrell,	Logan,	Sharon,
Davis of Illinois,	McDonald,	Teller,

NAYS—19.

Beck,	Eaton,	Hill of Georgia,	Pryor,
Blair,	Edmunds,	Hoar,	Randolph,
Booth,	Farley,	Kernan,	Rollins,
Davis of W. Va.,	Ferry,	Maxey,	Williams.
Dawes,	Hampton,	Morgan,

ABSENT—39.

Allison,	Coke,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Anthony,	Conkling,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,
Bailey,	Garland,	Kellogg,	Slater,
Bayard,	Groome,	Kirkwood,	Vance,
Blaine,	Grover,	Lamar,	Walker,
Bruce,	Hamlin,	McMillan,	Wallace,
Burnside,	Harris,	McPherson,	Whyte,
Butler,	Hereford,	Morrill,	Windom,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Colorado,	Pendleton,	Withers.
Carpenter,	Ingalls,	Platt,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate declines to adjourn, but as there is not a quorum voting the Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That has already been done, and the pending motion is to send for the absentees. We cannot filibuster forever by having the roll called right over again every time and then a motion of that kind. The want of a quorum was disclosed before, and a motion was made to send for the absentees. The roll of absentees was called. Then the Senator from Ohio moved again to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remind the Senator from Vermont that the call of the absentees disclosed a quorum present. The Senator from Ohio renewed the motion to adjourn, and on that a vote has been taken which disclosed the want of a quorum, and now it becomes the duty of the Chair to direct the absentees to be called.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, the Chair will not find anything of that kind, when there is a pending motion to send for absentees, if the Chair can recur to the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the absentees, and eleven Senators answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Twenty-eight Senators are absent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make no motion now; my motion is pending to send for absentees. It was pending when the Senator from Ohio moved to adjourn before.

Mr. TELLER. If only twenty-eight Senators are absent there is a quorum present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not make any difference whether there is a quorum present or not.

Mr. McDONALD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order that that motion is not in order, as no business has transpired since the last motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll has been called. Any debate is business, and the roll-call is business. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Chair overrule the point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to have it stated distinctly, so that it will go on the Journal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont will state his point of order, if he desires.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have stated it, and the Chair has overruled it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has overruled it. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, that the Senate adjourn.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 18, noes 19.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent, because I have no right to debate this motion, to make a statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When I rose at five o'clock, or whatever time it was, to submit a few remarks, it was suggested that we adjourn. The friends of the bill refused to adjourn and I went on. Now the friends of the bill desire to adjourn. It is quite evident to me, judging from the previous history of the Senate, that it would be a good many hours before a quorum could be got here to do business, because many of the gentlemen who answer on the call of the absentees are paired, so that they do not do anything else than answer. Therefore it appears to me that it is probably entirely useless to endeavor to go on further with this business to-night. It will be the unfinished business for tomorrow morning, and for one I will give in to the will of the majority, that would not adjourn but wanted to go on when I obtained the floor, and that wishes to adjourn now. I shall interpose no further opposition to an adjournment; it seems to be useless.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on the motion of the Senator from Indiana that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If there be no objection let the call be dispensed with.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the call be dispensed with.

Mr. TELLER. No; let the yeas and nays be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed with the call.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) On this subject I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] and therefore I shall not vote. I should vote "yea," and he would vote "nay," perhaps, but for the pair.

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. PENDLETON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY.]

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. WINDOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. WALKER.]

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—21.

Call,	Hampton,	Paddock,	Thurman,
Cameron of Wis.,	Jonas,	Plumb,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,	Voorhees.
Davis of Illinois,	Kirkwood,	Rollins,
Ferry,	Logan,	Sharon,
Gordon,	McDonald,	Teller,

NAYS—13.

Beck,	Eaton,	McPherson,	Williams.
Blair,	Hill of Georgia,	Maxey,
Booth,	Hoar,	Pryor,
Davis of W. Va.,	Kernan,	Randolph,

ABSENT—42.

Allison,	Coke,	Hill of Colorado,	Saulsbury,
Anthony,	Conkling,	Ingalls,	Saunders,
Bailey,	Dawes,	Johnston,	Slater,
Baldwin,	Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Vance,
Bayard,	Farley,	Kellogg,	Walker,
Blaine,	Garland,	Lamar,	Wallace,
Bruce,	Groome,	McMillan,	Whyte,
Burnside,	Grover,	Morgan,	Windom,
Butler,	Hamlin,	Morrill,	Withers.
Cameron of Pa.,	Harris,	Pendleton,
Carpenter,	Hereford,	Platt,

So the motion was agreed to; and (at seven o'clock and thirty-seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 25, 1880.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ADULTERATION OF ARTICLES OF FOOD AND DRINK.

Mr. BEALE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Manufactures, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 2014, a bill (H.

R. No. 4738) to provide for the welfare of the people in preventing the adulteration of articles of food and drink; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed and recommitted, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE-PRESIDENT.

Mr. BICKNELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the state of the laws respecting ascertainment and declaration of result of election of President and Vice-President, reported, as a substitute for House joint resolution No. 75, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 223) amending the Constitution as to election of President and Vice-President; which, with the accompanying report, was ordered to be printed and recommitted, not to come back on a motion to reconsider.

FRANCO-AMERICAN TREATY.

Mr. BERRY, by unanimous consent, presented the following joint resolution from the Legislature of California; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 10.

Passed the senate February 4, A. D. 1880.

M. D. BORUCK,
Secretary of the Senate.

Passed the assembly February 4, A. D. 1880.

C. E. GUNN,
Clerk of the Assembly.

This resolution was received by the governor this 11th day of February, A. D. 1880.

ALBERT HART,
Private Secretary of the Governor.

CHAPTER —.

Senate concurrent resolution No. 10, relative to Franco-American treaty.

Whereas the project of a proposed Franco-American commercial treaty agreed to by a private association which assembled in Paris in August, 1878, has been advocated publicly throughout the United States by an agent employed for that purpose by certain interested parties, citizens of France, whose avowed object is the general reduction of American tariffs upon all French products, especially such as silk, woolen, iron, and glass manufactures, wines and brandies, which products now encounter in the markets of this country a serious competition, owing to the successful establishment of American industries; and whereas the proposed treaty is intended to seriously affect and retard the most important of the growing industries of California, namely, the production of wine and brandy and the manufacture of silk and woolen goods, besides many others, which are now in their infancy, but which are depended upon by our people for present and future employment, for themselves and those who shall seek this State for new homes, and while such a treaty would, perhaps for a generation, retard and injure, and in some cases destroy, our leading industries, the ultimate result would be to reduce our working classes by injurious competition with the cheap and underpaid labor of foreign countries to conditions of life which would prevent their social advancement and material progress, except as permitted by the gradual progress which may take place in other countries, whose excess of population would enable them to dictate, through commercial rivalry, the wages of our people and the prices of their products, so long as our own Government should fail to protect our own people against degrading competition with cheap foreign labor; and whereas the negotiation of the proposed treaty with France would involve this country in dangerous precedents and international difficulties, and being for a term of years, would deprive our Government of the power to regulate tariffs for revenue or protection, as necessity may require; and whereas the present tariffs on wines and brandies and other French products are moderate and justly regulated for the purpose of obtaining revenue from foreign articles of luxury, so that the necessities of life may be taxed as lightly as possible, and any material reduction of the same would compel the Government to obtain revenue by increasing the taxes upon such necessities:

Resolved by the senate of California, the assembly concurring. That our Representatives in Congress be requested, and our Senators instructed, to use all honorable means to defeat the negotiation of the proposed treaty, and to make known to the Congress of the United States that the people of this State, of all parties, are adverse to any treaty or law which shall endanger our home industries, and that they appeal to the Federal Government to consider the great importance of fostering industry, and to remember especially the great sacrifices and patriotic efforts of our vinticulturists, who have successfully established, after encountering almost insurmountable obstacles in the form of public prejudice and foreign opposition, an industry which our people confidently believe will in the future support millions of citizens, and rival both in extent of commerce and in public estimation, even the vinticulture of France, and will become a source of great wealth to the entire nation.

Resolved further. That the governor be requested to transmit forthwith a copy of these resolutions to each of our Representatives and Senators.

JNO. MANSFIELD,
President of the Senate.
J. F. COWDERY,
Speaker of the Assembly.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

I, D. M. BURNS, secretary of state of the State of California, do hereby certify that I have compared the annexed copy of Senate concurrent resolution No. 10 with the original now on file in my office, and that the same is a correct transcript therefrom and of the whole thereof.

Witness my hand and the great seal of State, at office in Sacramento, California, the 12th day of February, A. D. 1880.

[SEAL.]

D. M. BURNS,
Secretary of State,
By THOS. H. REYNOLDS,
Deputy.

CADETS, MILITARY ACADEMY, WEST POINT.

Mr. COVERT. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, requested to transmit to this House a statement as to whether any of the cadets at the United States Military Academy at West Point who were recommended for dismissal from said academy by the academic board or other officers of said academy during the past or present year have been reinstated in said academy, or whether what is technically called "turn-backs" have been granted them or any of them; and if such reinstatement or other favorable action has been taken in any of such cases, whether such action was in accordance with a recommendation of said academic board, or otherwise; and if such reinstatement or other favorable action was not made in pursuance of the recommendation of said academic board, what reasons, if any, existed for such action.

Mr. DUNNELL. I object. I am willing that it should go to the Military Committee.

Mr. COVERT. That is my wish, that it should be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There was no objection, and the resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

IMPROVEMENT OF WISCONSIN RIVER.

Mr. CASWELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish the House with a copy of a report recently submitted to him by a board of engineers in reference to the improvement of the Wisconsin River.

SLAVERY IN CHINA.

Mr. DAVIS, of California, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the President be requested to transmit to the House of Representatives, if not deemed by him incompatible with the public interests, copies of such dispatches as have recently been received by the Secretary of State from the consul-general at Shanghai upon the subject of slavery in China, and those portions of the penal code of China which forbid expatriation.

LIGHT-SHIP ON FIVE-FATHOM BANK.

Mr. O'NEILL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish the House information from the Light-House Board and its views as to establishing a light-ship on Five-Fathom Bank, about ten miles north-northeast from the present light-ship, and an estimate of the cost.

ANNA A. PROBERT.

Mr. MONROE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4739) granting a pension to Anna A. Probert, widow of George C. Probert, late first lieutenant Third Ohio Cavalry; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HEIRS OF JOHN G. CAMP.

Mr. MONROE also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4740) for the relief of the heirs of John G. Camp, deceased, late of Sandusky, Ohio; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION.

Mr. DUNN. I ask unanimous consent to present for adoption at this time a resolution to investigate matters pertaining to the Hot Springs reservation in the State of Arkansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That the Committee on Public Lands, or any sub-committee appointed by the chairman thereof, be, and hereby is, instructed and directed to inquire into the manner in which the receiver appointed by the court under the provisions of section 5 of an act approved June 11, 1870, in relation to the Hot Springs reservation, in the State of Arkansas, performed the duties of said receivership, the amount and kind of property he took possession of in the name of the Government, what disposition was made thereof, what sum or sums of money he received for the rent or other use of said property, and generally to inquire fully into his conduct in that behalf, and also to investigate the manner in which the Hot Springs commission, appointed under the provisions of the acts of March 3, 1877, and December 16, 1878, in relation to the Hot Springs reservation in the State of Arkansas, have performed their duties; and to investigate fully all matters of alleged maladministration of said acts by said commissioners, or either of them, or by any officer or employee of said commission, either in the matter of making or rescinding orders of condemnation or making awards of the right of purchase under improper influences or speculating in contested claims or issuing certificates for condemned houses that have not been injured, removed, or taken by the Government; and to inquire into and ascertain what portion of the certificates issued by said commission for condemned buildings and property is just and right and what portion thereof is unjust, and into the receipts and expenditures of money on any and all accounts, and the amount of compensation received by said commissioners and each of their officers and employees, and into the settlement and condition of the account of any disbursing agent or officer said commission may have had; and generally to inquire fully into all of said matters and whether in any case wrong or injustice has been done to the Government or to individuals, and into the present condition, amount, kind, and value of property now held by the Government on the said Hot Springs reservation, and report by bill or otherwise such recommendations as they may deem wise and proper in the premises. And that said committee or any sub-committee thereof appointed as aforesaid shall have power to send for persons and papers, call and examine witnesses, administer oaths, sit during the sessions of the House, may have a clerk, stenographer, and messenger, and may proceed to said Hot Springs to prosecute said investigation, if deemed advisable by said committee, during the session of Congress; and the expenses of said investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House upon the certificate of the chairman of said investigating committee.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

Mr. DUNN. This resolution is directed to be presented by the unanimous order of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CONGER. I object to it if it comes from all of the committee.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to ask, in behalf of the Texas delegation, admission to the floor for Hon. John D. Templeton, secretary of state of Texas, during the day; and also, in behalf of Mr. CAMP, of New York, the same privilege for Hon. W. A. Coucher and W. Tiffany, of New York.

There was no objection, and the requests were granted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I demand the regular order.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman from New York will yield to me for a few moments, in order to call up an appropriation bill for the star service, which was introduced yesterday from the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands the regular order, and the regular order is the morning hour, which can only be dispensed with by the House itself, if the demand is insisted upon.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I insist upon the demand for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Georgia makes a motion to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. That requires a vote of two-thirds.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will insist upon a vote of two-thirds. The Chair understands the gentleman from Georgia to move to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is what I propose to do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia proposes to reach the appropriation bill for the star service.

Mr. UPSON. I hope that will not be done.

The SPEAKER. A question as to priority of business is not debatable.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent to state to the House the object I have in view.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks consent that he may be permitted to make a statement to explain why he asks that the morning hour shall be dispensed with.

Mr. CULBERSON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already stated that the gentleman's object is to reach the appropriation bill in reference to the star service.

The question being taken on the motion to dispense with the morning hour there were—ayes 111, noes 38.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the morning hour was dispensed with.

Mr. BLOUNT. Under instructions from the Committee on Appropriations, I ask leave to report back from that committee the bill (H. R. No. 4736) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriations for the transportation of the mails on the star routes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PAGE. To what?

The SPEAKER. To the gentleman from Georgia reporting the bill from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PAGE. I do not object to that, but I make the point of order that the bill should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering this bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. That is the gentleman's right. The gentleman from Georgia moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. UPSON. Can anything be said on that motion?

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SCALES in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that all bills on the Calendar be passed over informally until the bill which has just been referred to the Committee of the Whole be reached.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all prior bills be passed over, and that the bill he indicates be taken up. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to understand exactly the status of this bill. The Chair announced that the House was in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. My motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole was for the purpose of considering this bill.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) That was stated for the information of the House. The motion itself was in the usual form, to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Then the House being in Committee of the Whole, the Chair very properly submitted the question to the committee that prior bills be laid aside in order to reach this bill. That was agreed to by unanimous consent. The gentleman has now reached his bill.

MAIL TRANSPORTATION ON STAR ROUTES.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 4736) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriations for the transportation of the mails on star routes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880.

Be it enacted, &c., That out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, so much thereof be, and the same hereby is, appropriated as may be required to meet the expenses of inland mail transportation on star routes for the remainder of the current fiscal year at or within existing contract prices: Provided, That upon any route where there has been an increase of the original contract price during the last or the current fiscal year exceeding $5,000, the compensation on such route shall be reduced to the terms of the original contract on and after the 1st day of March next; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to forbid the payment to contractors of the one month's pay, as is usual in case of reduction or termination of contract.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I rise to make a point of order. I will ask the Clerk to read Rule 77. And then, in order to give the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] an opportunity to amend his bill, I will make the point of order that the section which has been read is not in accord with the requirements of the latter part of Rule 77.

Mr. CONGER. Let the reading of the bill be finished. The first reading has not been dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the further sum of $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, as aforesaid, to enable the Postmaster-General to place new service as authorized by law, and the further sum of $100,000 to increase the service on existing routes, including those on which a reduction has been provided for by the preceding section: Provided, That no increase shall exceed the rate of $5,000 a year upon any one route.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I now ask the Clerk to read Rule 77.

The Clerk read as follows:

77. It shall also be the duty of the Committee on Appropriations, within thirty days after their appointment, at every session of Congress, commencing on the first Monday of December, to report the general appropriation bills—September 14, 1837—for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; for sundry civil expenses; for consular and diplomatic expenses; for the Army; for the Navy; for the expenses of the Indian Department; for the payment of invalid and other pensions; for the support of the Military Academy; for fortifications; for the service of the Post-Office Department, and for mail transportation by ocean steamers; or, in failure thereof, the reasons of such failure. And said committee shall have leave to report said bills (for reference only) at any time.—March 2, 1865. In all cases where appropriations cannot be made specific in amount, the maximum to be expended shall be stated, and each appropriation bill, when reported from the committee, shall, in the concluding clause, state the sum total of all the items contained in said bill.—March 15, 1867.

Mr. BLACKBURN. In order to afford the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] an opportunity now to make his bill conform to the latter clause of Rule 77, I make the point of order, first, that the maximum sum to be appropriated under this intended appropriation bill is not stated at all, nor is any sum stated; and as to the second section of the bill, I make the point that it is obnoxious to the latter clause of Rule 77 because the sum total to be appropriated by the bill is not stated in its concluding clause.

Mr. CONGER. Rule 77 applies to general appropriation bills. It does not apply to a bill making a specific appropriation. The whole rule applies only to the general appropriation bills and their subject-matters are mentioned in the rule. The last clause of the rule, on which the gentleman from Kentucky makes his point of order, does not apply to the specific appropriations which may be reported by the Committee on Appropriations or to any deficiency bills. It never has been held to do so. If the Speaker were present I think he would bear me out in that statement. I submit, further, that this bill was introduced by unanimous consent and is being considered by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. All points of order were reserved on the bill.

Mr. CONGER. All points of order were reserved; but my point is that the point of order does not touch a deficiency bill or anything but the general appropriation bills; and it has always been so held in this House.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has fully met the point of order raised by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN.] It will be observed that the rule to which the gentleman refers provides for the regular appropriation bills. For instance, the Post-Office appropriation bill is made up of a great many items, for the compensation of postmasters, for the compensation of clerks in post-offices, for mail-route messengers, for route agents, for postal-car clerks, &c. The various items of appropriations contained in that bill are placed under several heads, such as the First, Second, and Third Assistant Postmasters-General, the many items constituting one whole. So with reference to all the other general appropriation bills.

When Rule 77 refers to items it means items of a different nature. What is the bill now before the committee? In the sense in which the word "items" is used in the rule there is but one item in the pending bill. It relates to the single item of star service, to the deficiency in the appropriations for that service. In that sense, therefore, the bill is only a single item. While this particular deficiency bill may have been divided into two paragraphs, the purpose of the bill is but one, to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the star service. Therefore I say that the point of order does not apply to this bill.

Again, we have in this instance all the certainty that the rule was intended to require. There are in this country in the neighborhood of ten thousand star routes for which contracts have been made. The first paragraph of this bill does not leave the House in any uncertainty as to what the Committee on Appropriations asks it to do. It provides that the service on these star routes, every single one of them, as the Government is bound by its contracts throughout the land, shall be the measure of this appropriation. Therefore there can be no uncertainty as to what is intended by the bill.

In a question of this sort the rule never was intended to require, and this House will not ask, that we should sit down and make the calculations necessary to indicate the specific amounts to be appropriated for all these ten thousand star routes. It might perhaps be possible to do that, but we are not expected to do more than to carry out the purpose of this rule if it operates upon this bill; that is to make certain what is intended to be done by this bill. This bill is just as certain in that respect as if it contained all the particular details. Therefore, I think the objection taken by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] on his first point of order is not well founded.

The gentleman also says that the sum total of all the items contained in the bill should be stated at the close of the bill. It is true there are two paragraphs of this bill, but they are practically but one item when it is understood. It must be remembered that in reference to general appropriation bills the word "items" relates to several matters of different kinds; that is, the pay of postmasters, the pay of route agents, the pay of inland transportation, &c.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It seems to me to be too plain a proposition to require that any time of the House shall be occupied in its discussion. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] is certainly at fault, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] seems to have fallen into the same error in saying that the clause of the seventy-seventh rule upon which I based my point of order applies to general appropriation bills only.

If gentlemen will take the trouble to look at the rule they will find that the House adopted it in March, 1865; but the clause of the rule under which I make the two points of order against this bill which I have indicated was adopted more than two years after that time, in 1867, by another Congress. Therefore, as a matter of date and of authority, the latter clause of the rule is the work of a different body of men from the body which adopted the preceding clause. To all intents and purposes, that clause of Rule 77 under which I make these points of order is an independent rule, created by a different Congress from the one which created the preceding clause, which refers to general appropriation bills.

I would like to know what authority the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] or the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] can find for the construction which they have endeavored to place upon this rule. The clause under which I make these points of order declares not that "general appropriation bills," not that "any of the general appropriation bills," not that "any appropriation bill," but that "in all cases" where the Committee on Appropriations report a bill to this House looking to the appropriation of money—"in all cases where appropriations cannot be made specific in amount, the maximum to be expended shall be stated," &c. Now, my point of order is that no maximum is stated in this bill. There are no figures in the bill at all, except in the second section of the bill, relating to certain disbursements which are not involved at all in the first section of the bill.

Again, the rule goes on to provide "and each appropriation bill"—does that mean "each general appropriation bill?" If the Congress that made this rule knew what it was doing and wanted to confine this rule only to general appropriation bills, why did it not so state? But the rule says, "and each appropriation bill"—that means general or special—"when reported from the committee, shall, in the concluding clause, state the sum total of all the items contained in said bill."

Now I am perfectly content to submit the points of order I have made to the decision of the Chair simply upon this re-reading of the last clause of the rule, and I shall be content with that decision whatever it may be.

Mr. BLOUNT. In reply to what the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] has stated, I wish to say this: he makes the point that this rule does not relate to general appropriation bills, but to all appropriation bills. By an examination of this rule it will be found that it stands as one rule, Rule 77, adopted by the House as a single rule, to be construed as but one rule, no matter at what dates the different clauses of the rule may have been adopted. It stands here as Rule 77, to be construed as one rule by the presiding officer, whosoever he may be at any given time.

The rule relates to the duty of the Committee on Appropriations in reference to appropriation bills; and, as I hold, those appropriation bills are general appropriation bills. If the gentleman is correct in his statement that this rule is intended to apply to all appropriation bills, whether the general appropriation bills reported by the Committee on Appropriations or any other, that it applies to any appropriation bill—

Mr. BLACKBURN. Oh, no; the gentleman certainly does not want to misconstrue my language.

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN?]

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman will of course yield for a correction.

Mr. BLOUNT. Always.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I say that, according to the plain language of Rule 77, the latter clause applies to every appropriation bill, general or special, large or small, specific or indefinite, that is reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLOUNT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I undertake to say that the position of the gentleman from Kentucky is not correct, and cannot reasonably be deduced from this rule. The gentleman now proposes, in construing the rule, to disconnect the latter clause from the clause referring to general appropriation bills; to treat the latter clause by itself and make it cover every single appropriation that may come from the Committee on Appropriations, whether embraced in a general appropriation bill or not. Now, I submit that it is unreasonable to suppose it to have been the intention of the House that every other committee of the House should be allowed the right to appropriate in a general way without stating any amount, without summing up the items, and that the Committee on Appropriations could never have the same right. And yet this is the conclusion to which the gentleman's argument would lead. According to his proposition every committee in this House except the Committee on Appropriations may do that thing. It seems to me reasonable to assume that no such construction was ever intended; that the language of the rule was designed to apply simply to these general appropriation bills; that when bills of this character come in, embracing twenty, fifty, a hundred or more items, covering in some instances eighty or one hundred pages, there should be in the concluding clause a statement of the aggregate amount appropriated.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to add much to what has been said by the gentleman from Georgia, except to call further attention to the fact that Rule 77 in its very commencement refers to general appropriation bills; and because general appropriation bills are not again specified in the latter part of the rule, it does not follow that the entire scope of the rule does not relate to general appropriation bills. It is this class of bills that the rule treats of.

In Rule 76 the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations is defined. It is declared among other things that all executive communications touching appropriations shall be referred to that committee. The truth is that this committee has jurisdiction to report not only the eleven or twelve general appropriation bills, but private bills; and it does report them week by week.

I will also recall to the recollection of the Chair the fact that bills making appropriations, as this bill does, without specifying the amount, have frequently been reported from the Committee on Appropriations.

Again, during the first session of this Congress I was directed to report from the Committee on Appropriations a deficiency bill to pay letter-carriers; and the Speaker of the House informed me that I had no right to report it as a privileged bill, because it was not one of the general appropriation bills. Yet it was a deficiency bill; not a general deficiency, but a deficiency bill for one single item.

This bill itself, when reported this morning from the Committee on Appropriations, was reported by unanimous consent, not under Rule 119, which gives certain privileges to general appropriation bills.

I do not wish to consume any more time upon the point of order, and with a single additional remark I will sit down. Even if there were anything in this point of order, it is now raised prematurely and out of time. This bill by unanimous consent has been reported to the House; on a point of order it has been sent to the Committee of the Whole, where we are now considering it. The time for general debate is now running, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] was upon the floor for this purpose when the point of order was made. The time to make this point of order, if it can ever be properly made, will be when the bill is being read by sections for amendment, which is not being done at this time.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Has not the bill been read through?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The bill has been read through, as all bills have to be read in Committee of the Whole when first taken up, unless the first reading is dispensed with by unanimous consent. But the reading by sections or paragraphs for amendment is yet to be had, after general debate shall have closed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does not the gentleman from Illinois know the rules of this House well enough to know that whenever debate has been had it is too late to make a point of order?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The point of order is made, and the Chair through courtesy, not under any rule of this House, listens to remarks upon the point of order.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Kentucky can make his point when we get to the paragraph to which it applies.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly he can make it when we get to that paragraph; but it is not now made in apt time, even if there is anything in it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. We are at the paragraph now; and if I should withhold this point of order until the gentleman from Georgia had uttered one word in the way of debate on the merits of the bill, then, under one of the plainest rules which the House has for its government, it would be too late for me to make the point of order.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman cannot be correct in that position, or else I have no recollection of the practice of this House, because the invariable practice in Committee of the Whole is first to read the bill in full, unless that reading is dispensed with. Then comes the general debate, and then, under the rule, the bill is read for amendment and five-minute discussion. We have not reached that period.

Now, sir, what would be the judgment of the Chair at this time? In the event the Chair decides in favor of this point of order, and that the bill is not under consideration for amendment, why, sir, points of order run along with the bill until it is considered for amendment when read by sections.

Mr. BLOUNT. In relation to what the gentleman has said—
Mr. CONGER. Let me call attention to the time when this rule was amended. I ask the Chair to turn to the seventy-seventh rule. Any gentleman who has the rules before him can do it. I will not read the rule, Mr. Chairman, but I desire to run along in Rule 77 to the last clause on which this point of order is made. March 15, 1867, Mr. BLAINE, from the Committee on Rules, offered the following amendment to the rules:

Amend Rule 77 by inserting after the word "failure," in the twelfth line, as follows:

"In all cases where appropriations," &c.—

being the last clause.

When this rule was adopted there was inserted, after the words "on failure thereof," "the reasons of such failure," so it would read "in all appropriation bills" mentioned by name, closing with "and for mail transportation by ocean steamers; or, in failure thereof, the reasons of such failure. In all cases where appropriations cannot be made specific in amount, the maximum to be expended shall be stated." Now there is not even those intervening words, "and said committee shall have leave to report said bills for reference at any time." The amendment as I find it in the RECORD reads as I have stated:

Amend Rule 77 by inserting after the word "failure," in the twelfth line, the following:

"In all cases where appropriations cannot be made specific in amount," &c.

With that continuation, without that intervening paragraph which has been inserted since, there can be no question which relates to appropriations under Rule 77. Rule 77 relates entirely to general appropriation bills. The rule itself, in the line immediately preceding where this was originally placed, mentions the list of the general appropriation bills. There is inserted the clause "and said committee shall have leave to report said bills at any time;" that is, the general appropriation bills. Under the amendment the appropriations referred to all relate to these general appropriation bills.

The question has been raised before this, and the Chair may probably remember that Rule 77 has been construed always to refer to general appropriation bills, those named in the rule, and not the pensions, not the claims, not the deficiencies, not to any appropriation.

If the Chair pleases to consider, this bill could not be reported at any time as a general appropriation bill may be at any time. The consent of the House had to be asked. Unanimous consent in this case had to be obtained. It is apparent, I think, to any one this is not one of the general appropriation bills. It has not so been treated this morning. If it were a general appropriation bill no consent was necessary. It would have been a question of privilege to report it. Consent was asked and it was granted for its consideration. Unanimous consent was given to pass over all other bills on the Calendar to take it up.

I do not wish to detain the committee longer, but my point is that the amendment to this Rule 77 on which the point of order is raised by the gentleman from Kentucky was inserted when it originally became a part of this rule. It was inserted after the word "failure" and thus made a part connected absolutely with the general appropriation bills, not severed from that rule even by that clause which allows these to be reported at any time.

My point then is, Mr. Chairman, this rule applies only to general appropriation bills; that it never is and never can be construed to apply to anything else. Rule 77, as a whole, applies to general appropriation bills because there are no other bills which may be reported for reference at any time. This is not such a general appropriation bill as is provided for in Rule 77. If it had been, the committee could have reported it at any time without asking for consent. In fact, this morning they had to ask unanimous consent of the House and obtained it because it was not a general appropriation bill. To my mind, it is a bill which can be amended if the point should be ruled against it. If that rule shall be considered to apply to other bills than general appropriation bills, I take it that it would be utterly impracticable.

I might say that it is not a point of order at any rate, but when we come to consider that question the motion can be made to amend it. You could not throw out the bill because that rule in regard to appropriation bills has not been complied with. It is still subject to amendment.

Mr. CASWELL. Mr. Chairman, we have a precedent for this bill. I concede that if the amount could be ascertained that it would be very proper to do so, and the rule in question is drafted for that purpose. At the first session of the Forty-fifth Congress, when both Houses were unable to agree on the amount that should be appropriated for the continuation of the service under the Government, we adopted a joint resolution from time to time authorizing the several Departments to continue the service of the Government under existing contracts, or in accordance with the same rate provided in the appropriation bills ending June 30 of that year. Suppose this rule had been drawn upon us in those cases, and the point of order made, we would have met the objection with the fact that it would be utterly impossible to ascertain the amount of the appropriation necessary. And this bill now under consideration is simply to authorize the Postmaster-General to continue the service under existing contracts, the exact amount not being accessible, nor can we ascertain it.

The conditions are precisely the same as those to which I have referred, and evidently the rule is not intended to apply to cases of that kind. It has reference to the twelve appropriation bills only, and has no reference whatever or application to those unascertained amounts which may arise in cases of deficiency, and therefore I think the rule has no reference whatever to the bill now pending.

The CHAIRMAN. While the Chair believes this is not a general appropriation bill under a strict construction of the rules, yet as it is an important point, and one comparatively new, the Chair prefers to submit it to the judgment of the committee.

Mr. BLACKBURN. What is the decision of the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. The decision is that while the Chair believes that this is not a general appropriation bill under the rules, yet as it is an important point he would prefer to have the decision of the committee upon it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Chair then declines to rule upon the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair submits simply his opinion, and refers the point of order to the judgment of the committee.

The question was submitted, "Is the point of order well taken?"

The point of order was overruled by the committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, shortly after the opening of the present session of Congress a communication was sent to this House asking for an appropriation of $2,000,000 for that portion of the annual transportation of the mails which is designated ordinarily as the star-route service. During the preceding and present fiscal year every dollar of money had been appropriated by Congress which the Department had asked for. For the fiscal year 1879 a million dollars of the increase on that branch of the service alone was voted, equivalent to a total increase for any consecutive four years which has preceded it since the war. For the present fiscal year in view of that appropriation the Committee on Appropriations deemed it advisable not to recommend the full amount asked for the fiscal year.

The House of Representatives and Congress saw fit to differ with it and voted every dollar that the Department asked for. In this condition of things the Committee on Appropriations but felt it their duty before voting away blindly $2,000,000 to ask the House to give them time and means to ascertain the reasons which required this appropriation to be made. The resolution for this purpose, therefore, was proposed and agreed to by this House. I regret that the situation of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] who was chairman of the sub-committee charged with this investigation is now and has been continually in charge of the report of the Committee on Rules, which has engrossed his time and prevented the committee from making a full report upon that resolution—

Mr. BLACKBURN. What is the statement of the gentleman? I deny that I prevented a report upon the resolution.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Kentucky totally misapprehends me.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I understood the gentleman to say he regretted that I had prevented a full report on the resolution.

Mr. BLOUNT. Not at all. I was simply saying that the gentleman from Kentucky, by reason of his connection with the conduct of the report of the Committee on Rules in this House, had been prevented—

Mr. BLACKBURN. Oh, no. The gentleman has no authority for making any such statement. I had no engagement of any sort which would have prevented me from doing every atom of work the committee was willing to do in making any investigation which the House should see fit to order.

Mr. BLOUNT. This is a matter the House does not care about.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then do not bring it up.

Mr. BLOUNT. I thought what I stated was correct. It is not a matter of very great importance. But I will state this: that matter has not been concluded, and we have not reached full information upon which to make a final report to this House, but there are some things which we may report.

The amount of money appropriated during the current fiscal year was $5,900,000; the rate of cost of the service for this year without any increase hereafter as to trips or as to additional routes would be $7,594,000.95. Section 3679 of the Revised Statutes declares that—

No Department of the Government shall expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations.

From the statement just read, of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, it is therefore apparent that they have expended beyond the appropriation we made for the service an amount which at the rate of cost December 30, 1879, would bring about a large deficit, being the difference between the sum appropriated and the sum just stated. Therefore it was not a simple question of magnifying the service in futuro that we had to encounter in considering the request for two millions of additional money.

The Second Assistant Postmaster-General, when interrogated, answered frankly as to the obligations of the Government at that date. When asked as to section 3679 he answered that he did not propose to violate the provisions of that statute. And I ask the attention of the members of this House to the answer or the explanation the gentleman saw fit to make in defense of his conduct in that direction.

The law authorizes contracts to be made, after advertisement, with the lowest bidders for a term not exceeding four years. There is no authority in any statute authorizing in terms the Postmaster-General to annul contracts. It is the usage to insert in the regulations which accompany proposals for bids and which are regarded as a part of them, a power on the part of the Post-Office Department, whenever it shall think that the public service requires it, to annul any contract by giving one month's extra pay. In the examination upon this matter the Second Assistant Postmaster-General announced decidedly, without equivocation, that if there was no more money appropriated the amount of money which had been appropriated for this fiscal year, after payment of the one month's extra pay, would be entirely exhausted by the 10th day of March, and that it was competent for him to do that thing. He announced, in response to a question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER,] that he could, if he saw fit, spend in one month every dollar which was appropriated for the star service, and then, by stopping every mail in this country, bring the expenditure inside of the appropriation. He announced further that he went on to spend this money, knowing that when he made the appeal to Congress—

Mr. BLACKBURN. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman from Georgia, but I must rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly I do.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Georgia—for I do not wish to make the point of order—that under the rules he has no right to use in an argument before the House testimony that may have been taken or partially taken before a committee in advance of any report thereon made to the House.

Mr. COOK. Which nobody has seen outside of the committee, so far as I know.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will say this in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky—

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let me explain. I do not think this is a proper time or a proper place for this argument, nor that the proper time or proper place will have come for the argument that the gentleman is now making until the committee of this House charged with that investigation shall have made its report.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I have simply this to say in reply: that that committee has made a partial report to this House, which is now being considered; and it is necessary for me to make such reference to the testimony upon which this report is founded as will justify the action of the committee. I insist, therefore, that I am in order.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I make the point of order, and I ask the Chair to rule on it.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. BLACKBURN. My point of order is that it is not in order for any gentleman to use or to refer to any testimony that may have been taken under the order of this House by one of its committees before the report shall have been made thereon by said committee, and while the investigation is still in progress.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to be heard on that point of order.

This deficiency bill was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Afterward the gentleman from Kentucky, from the Committee on Appropriations, introduced a resolution raising an investigation by that committee touching this deficiency and the cause therefor. That investigation has made some progress. Some evidence has been taken, and the sub-committee has made one report to the full committee touching the deficiency, and reported the very bill that is now being considered by this Committee of the Whole. In that evidence are certain tables and estimates furnished by the Post-Office Department which the whole Committee on Appropriations used in maturing this bill, and which they must necessarily use in giving the Committee of the Whole information touching the same. I think it is perfectly legitimate and proper that the committee having made a primary report it should be referred to, so far as regards any information the Committee on Appropriations may have that will enlighten the Committee of the Whole touching the deficiency bill now pending and being considered by this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, of course, is not to be presumed to have any knowledge of what has occurred in the Committee on Appropriations, but he sustains the point of order.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I ask an explanation of the condition in which that decision of the Chair leaves this question? I ask for information. A communication from the Post-Office Department was presented here asking an appropriation of $2,000,000 in addition to the annual appropriation of $5,900,000, to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for star routes. That communication was referred to the Committee on Appropriations for consideration and report. That committee sent for the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, who is in special charge of this matter of the star routes—

Mr. BLACKBURN. There is no objection to that information being used.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am not through yet.

The committee sends for the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, who comes to the committee bringing a large number of tabular statements and written communications, which are in print and may be had by members if they desire; perhaps, technically, they are not here. Those statements have been laid before us, and, of course, we had no other source of information in the world. We bring in a report here based upon that information. Now, under the point of order made by a member of the Committee on Appropriations, we are not allowed to refer to one figure in those tabular statements, to one word in those written communications made to us by the Post-Office Department. I submit that under the decision of the Chair we had better let this matter lie over for two or three days, and until a large edition of those statements and communications and all the testimony can be printed, so that the Committee on Appropriations may be able to state to this House upon what authority it has reported the bill now under consideration.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] need not have put himself to so much trouble to misstate the point of order that I made or the effect of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been decided.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I understand that, but the gentleman from Connecticut was allowed to discuss it after it was decided.

I simply desire to say that so far as the communications relative to this star-route deficiency made by the Post-Office Department to this House are concerned I do not understand that any one has attempted to make any objection to their being used. I certainly never did. I simply objected to what seemed to me to be an improper use of testimony now being taken before a committee of this House, upon which no report has ever been made, which testimony itself is not completed, for the witness himself whose testimony was being quoted, as both the gentlemen know, is yet to come back upon the stand and complete his testimony. And further, not one atom of that testimony is in possession of this House, or ever was in possession of it, or can be until a report is made by the committee.

When that report is made the star service and its management by the Post-Office Department will have full attention, and no fuller attention at the hands of any man in the House than mine.

Mr. HAWLEY. And by that time this bill will be useless and the country will be involved in $1,700,000 of expense beyond the possibility of prevention.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I think so, too, unless the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] will allow the bill to pass.

Mr. BLOUNT. Do I understand that under the ruling of the Chair no information which the Committee on Appropriations may have obtained in their investigation, and which information is the basis of this bill which has been reported by them to the House, can be referred to by the committee reporting the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that there is no right to refer to what has taken place in committee, and so far as the remarks of the gentleman relate to what has transpired in committee the Chair rules they are not in order.

Mr. HASKELL. I desire to state on this point of order, if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] will allow me—

Mr. HUTCHINS. Is debate in order on the point of order, after the Chair has decided it?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order, the point of order having been decided.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Then I make the point of order that the gentleman from Kansas is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. HASKELL. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kansas rise?

Mr. HASKELL. I rise primarily to make an inquiry—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HASKELL. And a statement in reference to the point of order under discussion. I have in my possession a portion of the printed testimony taken—

Mr. HUTCHINS. I call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] is not in order, and will please take his seat.

Mr. HASKELL. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HASKELL. My point of order is that there is a point of order pending before this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. That point of order has been decided and sustained.

Mr. HASKELL. There is no point of order, then, before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. There is none.

Mr. HASKELL. Then I beg the pardon of the Chair for troubling him with any proposed remarks on a point of order that does not exist.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire again to ask what limit there is upon my referring to information which has induced the Committee on Appropriations to report this bill? The report was made after an examination of officials of the Government connected with this star service, which examination was made by virtue of an order of this House directing us to seek such information for the purpose of making a report, which report we have made in the form of the bill now pending before this committee. I understand the Chair to state that any official communication in relation to the matter of this bill may be referred to. Do I understand the Chair to confine me to communications in writing or to verbal communications?

The CHAIRMAN. Any communications which may have been referred to the committee by the House the gentleman is at liberty to speak of.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then, Mr. Chairman, there have been no communications referred to the committee by the House; and under the ruling of the Chair, if adhered to, we can refer to nothing which occurred in committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can only decide on a question as it arises. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then, sir, I will not refer to the testimony; but I will allude to what is known to every member of this House through official communications and through the press of the country. It is known officially to this House that there is needed for the purpose of continuing the service contracted for to the end of the fiscal year, in connection with the increases which have been made, the sum of $2,000,000. It is known officially to this House that so much of the appropriation already made has been expended that within the last few hours, if we may rely upon the statements of the press, the Postmaster-General has issued an order to every contractor in this land that on every star-service route the service shall be reduced to one trip per week; that this order is issued by reason of the lack of funds to continue the service at the present rates of increase. It is known to us that at this time in many of the States there are now seven trips a week, five trips a week, three trips a week, in connection with this star service, and that by reason of the contracts which have been made and which have exhausted the funds we are brought to the attitude of having the service on all these routes cut down to one trip per week.

We appropriated money enough to continue this service on all the routes of the country except 107 to the end of this fiscal year, by the addition of the small sum of $500,000. A sum of money was voted which would have enabled the Department to give better service than we had had for many previous years. The expenditure of this vast sum of money within the first half of the fiscal year, before any intimation was given to Congress upon that subject, was communicated to this House under what circumstances? When the House could not by any possibility consider the question as to what should be the service for the fiscal year; when a preceding House had determined what should be that service; when the laws of the land rightly construed held the Department down to that service. This communication was brought to us when the House was under duress as to the matter of appropriating money; when we could not consider the question as representatives of the people, having the original right to determine how much money should be expended in this manner. I say that this was done deliberately. The Postmaster-General and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General must be presumed to have intended in matters of this sort what they did.

What, then, is the condition of this House? What has the Department deliberately done? It has gone on and expended this money in such a manner that if existing contracts are carried out in good faith the whole of the moneys appropriated will be exhausted by the 10th of April, leaving this service without any money at all—absolutely destroying the service. Mr. Chairman, I ask whether, in the history of this country, there ever was such audacity on the part of any departmental officer in time of peace and in the absence of any public exigency? The Postmaster-General and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General have deliberately gone on and made contracts in violation of law to the extent of $1,700,000, and have then come to this House and pretended to submit the question whether the service should be continued for the remainder of the year; but they have deliberately submitted that proposition when we cannot refuse it without destroying the mail service of the country. I ask whether the representatives of the people of this country—whether the two hundred and ninety-three members of this House, with whom resides the power of originating appropriation bills—are to be toyed with, contemned, and despised in this manner?

Sir, I do not hold that there are no exigencies in which an officer may not exceed an appropriation. We all remember that at the time of the troubles with Spain the Secretary of the Navy enlisted fifteen hundred additional men for the Navy. When Congress met that action was submitted, and was justified on the ground of threatened war with Spain. But in this case there was not the slightest exigency. And we are mocked with the miserable, foolish sophistry that the officer responsible in this case can save himself from the operation of the statute by destroying the mail service of the country; and we are expected to accept such a statement. Destroy the mail service of the country! Annul every contract in the land! Say to the contractors on ten thousand routes "You relied on our faith; we entered into contract with you; all that you could reasonably expect was that when the public interests of the country might require it the Government should annul this service; but now with a ruthless hand, with utter disregard of the interests of the public service, we propose to annul those contracts, to bankrupt you, in order that we may clear our guilty skirts by saying we have not spent more money than was appropriated."

Why, sir, such a proposition deserves the indignation of the House. Such an officer does not deserve the confidence of any administration; and if this is the manner in which the public funds are to be used, I trust that this House, without reference to party, with true regard to the laws of the land, with true regard to their honest administration, will resort to remedies which shall make an example that will drive such miserable sophists from place hereafter.

Mr. Chairman, this was the attitude in which we found this subject when we came to take it up. How has this money been spent? Why, sir, during the fiscal year from July 1, 1878, to June 30, 1879, and during the half year from July 1, 1879, to December 31, 1879, $2,178,970 was expended for multiplying trips on routes, and in expediting the service.

Specific reasons have been urged upon different gentlemen at different times in regard to the service. Sometimes gentlemen from the South have been told that the service there has been largely increased; and this was offered as an inducement for a large increase of appropriation.

Out of these $2,000,000 how much of it has gone there? Five hundred and four thousand dollars have gone to Maryland, West Virginia, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Missouri, Tennessee, and Kentucky. Two hundred and ninety-four thousand dollars of that $500,000 went into the State of Texas. One hundred and sixty-five thousand dollars of that $294,000 which went to Texas is for a route from Fort Worth to Fort Yuma, some fifteen hundred miles long, with thirty-two post offices and $38,000 of receipts. So when they have gone into the State of Texas with $294,000, $165,000 of that amount went into the pockets of a single contractor who, at that time, was carrying a daily mail between those two points, the mail starting each day from each of the terminal points and going to the other. In addition they put on this $165,000 in that country without population covering sixteen hundred miles of space—placing this service in the hands of a single contractor—when the populous portions of Texas did not get one-half of the increase which went to Texas.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman should not forget that during Mr. Buchanan's administration—

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not yield for a speech, although I will yield for a question.

Mr. MILLS. I thought you were misleading the House and that you would yield to a statement that during Mr. Buchanan's administration $600,000 was paid for that route.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have nothing to do with what has been paid. There has been a good deal of bad management in reference to the mail service of the past. I do not wish to mislead the House but to inform it in reference to facts necessary for a correct judgment. I know that by reason of law this route was advertised and bid for for the sum of $134,000, but I submit to this House whether that is not abundant service for any State in this Union, much less this comparatively sparsely populated portion of Texas.

You can take ten of these routes, as follows: One in the Indian Territory, one in Dakota, one in Texas, one in Montana, one in Wyoming, one in New Mexico, three in Arizona, one in Oregon, two in California, twelve routes, let originally, under operation of law, to the lowest bidder at the rate of $240,296.25. The Department has increased that service by its own orders to $1,184,286.29. Here in three States and nine Territories is an increase of $943,990.04 on twelve routes, which disposes of at least more than one-half of this sum. In these routes, too, sir, I ask you to observe there are not, as might be supposed, single trips a week. In the Indian Territory there is originally one trip a week; most of the others are three times a week at the original contract price without increase.

The committee found, Mr. Chairman, on examination of official data and the records of the Post-Office Department, they might safely submit to the House the following propositions which are contained in this bill. First, that the routes as they are now served throughout this country should be continued except where the increase exceeded the sum by $5,000. On examination of the records of the Department, it has been ascertained that the operation of this exception touches only one hundred and seven routes in the United States out of about ten thousand.

Mr. DUNNELL. Can the gentleman state where those routes are located, in what States and Territories?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. BLOUNT. I will be glad, Mr. Chairman, to answer the gentleman's question if I can find the paper which I have here.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask the gentleman the question, if it is convenient to him to answer.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will send to the Clerk's desk, to be read in answer to the question of the gentleman from Minnesota, the information which he asks.

The Clerk read as follows:

Number of star routes increased over $5,000 in each State and Territory in 1879 and since July 1, 1879.

Montana.....	7
Wyoming.....	3
Colorado.....	15
New Mexico.....	7
Arizona.....	11
Utah.....	4
Idaho.....	3
Oregon.....	8
Nevada.....	11
California.....	14
Louisiana.....	3
Texas.....	9
Indian Territory.....	4
Kansas.....	1
Nebraska.....	1
Dakota.....	6

Total increases..... 107

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, it will be seen, as I have previously stated, that the first clause of this bill touches none except those one hundred and seven routes which have been referred to. The Postmaster-General in his annual report to this House states by reason of the present law in relation to the multiplication and increase of service that the Government is greatly injured. He claims that he has not power to protect the Government against bad contracts in relation to the increase of trips or the expedition of service, and he asks legislation.

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads have reported a bill to the House through its chairman [Mr. MONEY] in which they take this identical sum of $5,000 as the arbitrary line from which he may proceed to correct this abuse. This bill simply restores the original price on that service, and puts it back on that class of routes and gives the opportunity to the Government to correct, by advertising or such methods as Congress may see fit to provide, the abuses into which it has fallen in relation to these long trips and where there has been an undue increase of service. As to the amount of money which is necessary to keep the trips under $5,000 in operation, the committee vary in their estimates of from five to seven hundred thousand dollars, but in order that there may be no trouble in the mind of any gentleman in this House as to whether money enough was provided for this service, it was distinctly stated that such sum of money as is necessary to keep up the service to or within the present contract rates is hereby appropriated. So that every gentleman may be assured that that branch of the service is not touched. And as to the service above that the Government has been suffering from abuses under the operation of the present law. It strikes them down and allows full play to the bill reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads in correcting these abuses and putting the Government upon a fair obligation with contractors.

The last portion of the first section provides that nothing herein contained shall be construed to forbid the payment to contractors of one month's pay, as is usual in case of reduction or termination of contract. The committee found that in the contracts which they proposed to annul and abate in part as to the amount, there was a stipulation on the part of the officer in charge of the postal service of this country, the contracting party on the part of the Government with these several contractors, that in the event they should annul the contract or abate trips there should be allowed to them one month's pay.

The committee, although favoring this bill, deemed that they were serving the Government no less in maintaining their obligation as to this month's extra pay to contractors than they were in saving the Government from the disadvantages arising from the present legislation which they secured from annulling those contracts. And I take it no gentleman can find fault in that regard.

After providing in the first section that there should be enough money to continue all the service of the routes where the increase of cost was under $5,000, they felt that there was a necessity in many parts of the country for an additional trip here and there. A large portion of the fiscal year was gone. They deemed it, therefore, fit to appropriate the sum of $100,000, which might be applied to all routes where the increased cost was not $5,000 for the purpose of increasing the service thereon.

Mr. MAGINNIS. That has no relation to the length of the routes?

Mr. BLOUNT. No, sir.

Mr. MAGINNIS. It would be the same on routes which were ten or ten hundred miles in length.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes. They considered that amount of $100,000 for that portion of the fiscal year as equivalent to $300,000 for the purpose of putting service on routes where no service existed at all. In both of these items as to the $100,000, judged by the service and the amount of money used in this way, we felt that we had amply provided for it. And hence we concluded to report this measure to the House.

Mr. VALENTINE. May I ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman will confine himself to a question, but I can yield for no other purpose.

Mr. VALENTINE. I see this bill provides that upon routes where there has been an increase of the original contract price during the last or the current fiscal year exceeding $5,000 the compensation shall be reduced to the terms of the original contract.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. VALENTINE. I desire to know if you can state how many routes, during the time specified here, have been increased or expedited?

Mr. BLOUNT. I have already stated that there are one hundred and seven of them, out of a total of about ten thousand.

Mr. VALENTINE. That does not answer my question at all.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I thought I stated and I think the gentleman will comprehend me, that on one hundred and seven routes there was an increase of the service by multiplication of trips and by expedition of schedule.

Mr. VALENTINE. In excess of $5,000?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes.

Mr. VALENTINE. How many were there not in excess of that? That is what I want to know.

Mr. BLOUNT. There are about ten thousand routes in all. Perhaps I do not apprehend the gentleman. I understand him now to ask how many routes there are under the $5,000?

Mr. VALENTINE. Which have been increased or expedited?

Mr. BLOUNT. I am not able to give the gentleman the exact number. But the sum of money is about $300,000, or between three and four hundred thousand dollars, from the best information we have. And when the committee see that this is distributed all over the land they will at once apprehend the enormity which has been perpetrated in relation to the service in a few States and Territories of this Union cannot occur with them.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BLOUNT. I yield for a question.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask the question for my own information, because there has been so much confusion that we have not heard the gentleman distinctly. My question is why the sum of $5,000 is put there; why this variation from the contract price does not apply to all these cases instead of being limited to a margin of $5,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, it is well known that the abuse under the law authorizing an increase of service by reason of multiplication of trips and expedition of service is to be found in its highest operation in the longest lines. For instance the cost on one route, known as the Vinita and Las Vegas, was increased from $13,000 to $150,000. I could cite many other cases showing that that is where the importunities come in and that is where the Government suffers. There are a great many routes in which increase of trips or expedition of service is needed. In the smaller routes we apprehended that here was no special importunity, and in relation to those there was no special suffering to the Government by virtue of the operation of these laws; that it was not necessary, therefore, to touch every single route in the country, but that we should fix upon some arbitrary sum, to wit, $5,000, which we felt would relieve the Government from the misfortunes of this law. And so we did select the limit stated. And, singular to say, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, who have had this very matter under consideration, the damage sustained by the Government by reason of the increase of the service by multiplication of trips and expedition of service, have taken the sum of $5,000 and left the balance to the Department, thinking it perfectly harmless.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. Do you accompany the existing service on the Worth and Yuma line?

Mr. BLOUNT. Our bill was not intended to strike down the service anywhere. It was intended to save the Government from the abuse which came not from letting out contracts under the operation of law by competitive bidding, but which arose after that in increases by order of the Department, where nobody else had any opportunity to be heard unless the contractors themselves.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. But you do cut it down on some of the long lines and on some of them you do not?

Mr. BLOUNT. We cut it down on the line from Fort Worth to Yuma $165,000 and leave it at the original contract price of $135,000. That is the figure at which it was bid for in competitive bidding and we have let it remain. We have let it remain as the Government has contracted by virtue of competitive bidding. Now after remaining so the mail starts every day from each of the terminal points to the other.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. Was that during this fiscal year?

Mr. BLOUNT. That was increased during the last fiscal year.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. I will, although my time is limited.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Why would it not be more just and equitable, if you want to make such a sweeping reduction as that, to make it on every route where the cost has increased over 20 per cent. per mile? The gentleman must see that on a route fifteen hundred miles in length an increase of $5,000 might be very small; while on a route fifteen or twenty or thirty miles in length there might be a much greater proportional increase and yet it would not be touched by his bill. Would it not be better to put the increase at so much per mile? Or would that lose the gentleman so many votes east of the Mississippi River that he could not carry his bill?

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman has got in his speech. I want to say in reply to the gentleman—

Mr. BELFORD. Will the gentleman allow me to put another question at that point?

Mr. BLOUNT. I can only answer one question at a time. I will hear the gentleman from Colorado afterward. The gentleman from Montana asks, would it not have been more just to have stricken down all these routes pro rata? I answer him that he might have added another question: Would it not have been more just to have gone to every State in this Union and said how much each one of them should have or how many trips each one of them should have each week?

Mr. MAGINNIS. It is simply a question of increase.

Mr. BLOUNT. Oh, no! The gentleman refers just to that part of the question that suits him; but I am not discussing this from the stand-point of what is just to Representatives here requiring this as a fund to be divided out among all of us. I am discussing it simply from the stand-point of what is the interest of the service where the abuses have occurred and how we are to reach them.

The gentleman from Montana asks another question, whether or not the object in reporting the bill in this way was to let it go before the House in such a shape that votes would not be lost for our measure? I submit, sir, that if by reason of the accidental condition of the service the abuses touch the gentleman's Territory, or any other Territory of this Union, or any sparsely populated State, it is no argument to suggest that you lose votes if you do not allow the like abuses elsewhere. The truth is that there is no danger elsewhere; elsewhere there are large populations, large industries, great intercourse, so much so as to justify the voting away the money of the people. For one I am willing that the gentleman should have, and he will have, after this reduction shall have been made in his own Territory, as will be the case with most of the other Territories, a service then left more than equal in the number of trips per week to the service in my own State.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Take the star service and railroad service combined in your State—

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me. I am referring to the star service. If the people of the gentleman's Territory have not the means to build railroads out there, if the population of that Territory has gone in advance of civilization and surrounded itself with circumstances of that character, I do not see that we of other sections should be compelled to give them more service than we have ourselves. A moment ago the gentleman did not say anything about railroads, but submitted a question in regard to the justice of this bill in its relation to the star service in his Territory as compared with that of other sections of the United States. I repeat that after we shall have done what this bill proposes, those very Territories and those States will have more trips per week than nine-tenths of the States of the South like that from which I come.

Mr. BELFORD. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BLOUNT. Very well; a question.

Mr. BELFORD. I understand that if this bill shall become a law the effect of it will be that the town of Leadville will have only one service per week—a town of forty thousand people. Will not that be the effect of this bill?

Mr. BLOUNT. I will not endeavor to answer the gentleman in the two minutes of time which I understand is left me. I believe that a great deal of my time has been taken up in answering questions which gentlemen have propounded.

There is a question involved in this bill larger than the mere amount of money. There has been an audacity exhibited on the part of one of the Departments of this Government that no potentate in Europe where there is any pretense of rights on the part of the people would have shown toward the legislative branch of the government. The Queen of England would not have dared to have gone to her Commons as we have been approached by this Department of our Government.

If we are to judge by the newspapers of the country, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General has declared that there might be complaint, that committees might criticize, that the press might carp at his action, but his money he would have; that we were in such an attitude, but there by his own action, that we could not free ourselves of the necessity of giving him this money. Therefore, with such an administration, it becomes us to insert the very restrictions inserted in this bill, in order that we may by further legislation tie the hands of this Department and prevent the wrongs which have been committed in connection with the administration of this or any other branch of the postal service. I trust, therefore, that the House will see fit to pass this bill in its present shape.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. I shall not detain the committee long, for I doubt not that every member has made up his mind how he will vote on the question here presented. I am not of the majority of the Committee on Appropriations recommending the passage of this bill. My objection to the bill is not on account of its main features or of either of its two main features.

In the first place, the object of the bill is to supply a deficiency in the postal star service, with which the country is now brought sharply face to face. I need not dwell upon the fact that the Post-Office Department made its recommendations to Congress for appropriations for this service for the current fiscal year, and predicated those estimates upon more miles of service than it now has to-day and more routes by seven hundred than it has yet put service upon.

The estimate of the Department for that service was $5,900,000 for all the star service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880. Every dollar of that estimate was given. That estimate was not pruned nor touched to the extent of a single dollar.

That appropriation is now about exhausted, and we are told and know that upon the 10th day of the next month there will not be one dollar left to carry on this great postal service of the country unless this or some other deficiency bill shall be passed in the mean time. The star service of this country means all the mail service which the country has, except its railroad and its steamboat service.

It is estimated that it will take $1,720,000 to carry on the star service at its present rate; that it will take that amount in addition to the $5,900,000 already voted and already spent, and in many instances already squandered. In addition to that sum $300,000 more is asked in order that there may be a still further increase of the service, an expedition of schedules in the matter of delivery.

The main features of this bill are two: the first, to provide such sums of money as may be absolutely necessary to meet the deficiency and to prevent the stoppage of the mails throughout every State and Territory in the Union. With that purpose I fully concur. It matters not whether it shall be found hereafter that there have existed abuses in this Department and that money has been injudiciously and extravagantly expended; that is not the present issue. I take it that no one wants to deprive the country of its mail service upon its ten thousand star routes.

The second main object of this bill is to put a limitation upon what the committee believes to have been an abuse of discretion upon the part of the Post-Office Department. In that too I am thoroughly in sympathy, and I will heartily support it. But I do not believe this bill is carefully enough drawn to accomplish that second purpose, and there is my first and main objection to the bill.

I believe there should be a sum total stated in the bill as the maximum sum to be expended, as the rule of the House requires should be done. I believe the bill should provide that so much money as may be found necessary for the purposes indicated in the bill, in no event to exceed a given sum, shall be hereby appropriated.

Now, sir, there is my main objection to the bill.

Mr. HASKELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the gentleman will excuse me, I suggest to him that I am not here advocating the passage of this bill, and I do not expect to retain the floor five minutes. Those gentlemen of the Committee on Appropriations who are in charge of the bill and are supporting it will probably feel that they are entitled to be heard in its discussion in detail.

Those are the only two main points in the bill, and with the purpose in both instances I thoroughly agree. I do not think the bill is carefully enough drawn in its first section to secure that limitation upon the exercise of the discretion of this Department which I believe to be necessary, and which I know every member of the Committee on Appropriations believes to be necessary. In passing I will call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia (for I shall make no effort to antagonize his bill after I have finished my short statement) to the fact that in the twelfth line of the first section the word "next" should be struck out and "1880" inserted; otherwise this bill, not becoming a law until next Tuesday or later, would not be limited to the beginning of the coming month at all, but, contrary to the purpose of the whole committee, would have an operation twelve months in advance.

Again, sir, I would call attention to the concluding portion of that section:

But nothing herein contained shall be construed to forbid the payment to contractors of the one month's pay as is usual in case of reduction or termination of contract.

This seems to me to be inferential. I do not see that the bill makes any appropriation for the pay of this one month's extra service where contracts are to be canceled or reductions made. These are the only criticisms I have to pass upon the bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I cannot for my life see the necessity or the good judgment of prolonged discussion on this measure. The question is simply whether the star service of the Post-Office Department shall be continued. I do not understand that the question as to the propriety or impropriety of the manner in which that service has been conducted up to this time is properly before the committee or the House for determination now. This House, by a resolution passed without objection, has instructed the Committee on Appropriations to inquire into the causes of this enormous deficiency in this branch of the service, and to report the facts thereon. That committee is to-day prosecuting the investigation. The examination has not been finished, not as my friend from Georgia said because the chairman of the sub-committee of investigation has been too much occupied with work upon the rules to report, but simply because it has been impossible to get from the Treasury Department a detailed statement of the business of the Sixth Auditor's office in connection with this branch of the postal service. As a further reason I may mention that it would have been impossible for that committee, if it had been charged with nothing else than this inquiry, to have closed its testimony and finished its work by this time.

I therefore protest—and I make this statement as an explanation of my conduct toward the gentleman from Georgia who has charge of this bill—that in making the point of order on him and preventing his discussion of the testimony that had been taken before the committee of investigation, I did not do so because I was unwilling for the House and the country to know that testimony. I did it because I was determined to protect that committee as far as possible in its work of inquiry and to reserve its testimony and its proofs until the committee shall have completed its labor and brought the product of the inquiry to the House in a formal report for consideration and action. Until that time comes I do not deem it wise to indulge in a discussion of such a wide range as it appeared to me the gentleman was about to open.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is it not true that the investigation made by the committee was open, that anybody who wanted to was allowed to come into the room, and anybody who wanted to was allowed to look at the testimony?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Of course, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then how was the testimony protected?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not want to protect the testimony. I do not want to cover with the cloak of secrecy anything that that committee of investigation may do. I was not seeking to protect the Department nor to protect that testimony. I was seeking to protect that committee of investigation; for I want, and I sincerely trust we shall get, a fair opportunity to come before this House not upon any ex parte statement, not upon any incomplete testimony, but with all the facts on record, and then and not till then hold this Department to a rigid accountability for its conduct in the disbursement of public money. I know as well as the gentleman knows exactly what we are to meet when that report comes into this House. I think I see, without the aid of a prophetic eye, the legions that are to be arrayed against us. I do not mean to prejudice any case; but I do mean to say that when that report shall be brought before this House no man shall go further than I pledge myself to go to vindicate the heads of that Department if they have been honest, or to punish them even by prosecution to impeachment if they have been dishonest.

I know precisely what we have to encounter when we attack anything affecting the interests of the postal service and reaching to a criticism of the heads of that Department. I see before me here to-day the heads of that Department on the floor of this House—plying their vocation, I take it, to influence the votes of members. I saw them here yesterday, when the public prints of the country had given out that effort was to be made by another committee of this House to relieve the committee of investigation from any further duty and take its work out of its hands.

Mr. MONEY. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MONEY. Where does the gentleman get this information from? Does he get this information from the public prints?

Mr. BLACKBURN. What information?

Mr. MONEY. That another committee intended to take upon itself the duty of relieving the Committee on Appropriations of the further consideration of this business.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Did I get it from the prints of the country? I did.

Mr. MONEY. I desire to say on the part of that committee—

Mr. BLACKBURN. I can satisfy the gentleman from Mississippi by saying that immediately on my appearance in the House on Monday I received assurance from him, so far as he was concerned, neither he nor his committee had any such purpose.

Mr. MONEY. There has been no intimation from that committee which will justify any such statement in the prints as the gentleman refers to.

Mr. BLACKBURN. My statement has entirely relieved you and your committee. I desire simply to prevent whatever contest there is for this, that the investigation shall not be thrust on the committee before its report has been produced or its labors concluded. But I do not see how it is connected with this bill.

I think the purpose of this House is taken not to let the star service of this country be stricken down by one fell blow, as the Post-Office Department to-day proposes to do it. I do not want it done myself. I do want this: I want one main feature of this bill, to which I have alluded, preserved and continued; and it is that feature which puts back to the original contract terms every star postal route of the country on which extra compensation has been allowed during the current fiscal year of more than $5,000. I want that done, and I trust sincerely it will be done.

One word on that point and I am done. When, on the 1st day of July last, the Post-Office Department made an estimate for the service of these different routes they, according to law, advertised for service on those routes, and they accepted bids to do such service as that Department, on the 1st of July, said would be needed for this fiscal year. All this bill proposes to do is to say, for the remainder of the fiscal year, those largely increased routes shall be put back to the terms and conditions of the original contract in each case which represents the service the Post-Office Department itself said was needed on the 1st of July; that, and no more. And when you do that you have cut short, at the rate of more than one million of money, these excesses.

I wish also to put a limit to what the Post-Office Department terms "its discretion," under the exercise of which it lets a contract at $6,330 a year, and immediately, without advertisement, without further bidding, without opening to anybody to come in and bid, by arbitrary order, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General allows $136,000 a year as extra compensation. That is but a sample. I might go on and multiply them by the score. I wish to see that questionable discretion limited by absolute legislation, and that this bill proposes to do. The only question for me on that point is whether it is sufficiently explicit and severe.

I yield the remaining portion of my time to the gentleman from Illinois. [Mr. CANNON.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. How much time has the gentleman left?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have occupied eighteen minutes, and the gentleman has the remainder of the hour.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that I have any desire to make a political speech, or to abuse anybody, whether it be the democratic members of Congress or their democratic constituency, so far as they have asked for the service which has brought about this deficiency in the Post-Office Department. As the gentleman from Kentucky has well said, this matter is under investigation, and "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." When that time comes and the committee shall make its report, if I do not get sick and die, I shall be here myself, and we will have a good time all around. [Laughter.] So much for that part of the gentleman's speech as well as that part of the speech of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] which was outside of the facts touching this deficiency.

I am going to talk about the deficiency which this bill proposes to make appropriation to supply, giving such information as I may have touching it.

The Postmaster-General by his estimate for this fiscal year asked Congress to appropriate $5,900,000 to pay for the inland mail transportation known as the star service, that is the service other than by railway and steamboat. Congress has always been liberal in its appropriations for this branch of the service, and in a spirit of liberality gave all that was asked. The fiscal year commenced on the 1st day of last July and the Department then commenced to spend the money. After Congress commenced this session the Postmaster-General sent a communication to the House of Representatives, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, asking for an appropriation of $2,000,000 in addition to the $5,900,000 already given for this year, $1,720,000 of which is to be used in paying for existing service, as he tells us, and $280,000 for new service to be commenced hereafter.

This communication caused surprise not only in Congress but in the country, for no one supposed when Congress adjourned in June last that there would be any necessity for such a request. The committee, upon inquiry, found service had been placed upon thirteen hundred new routes during this year, established at the last session of Congress, at a cost of $434,000. This was a legitimate expenditure of money provided Congress had made the necessary appropriation therefor, and if this was all, there would be but little difficulty, I apprehend, in making the necessary appropriation to cover it. It was found, however, that the principal expenditure which caused the deficiency arises from an increase of service and its cost upon certain routes the contract term for which has not and will not expire for some years to come. These routes are one hundred and seven in number, and the original contract price per annum, made respectively on the 1st day of July, 1878, and the 1st day of July, 1879, for service thereon, was $1,041,437; while the present pay thereon, for increase of trips and expedition, by order of the Department made last year and this year, is over $2,178,000 per annum; making the total pay thereon per annum $3,219,437.

The increase upon each one of these routes ranges from over $5,000 to $165,000 per annum. So the committee concluded that if this extraordinary increase could be safely dispensed with that a much less appropriation than is asked for would be sufficient; and to ascertain what amount would be necessary to appropriate upon that basis the following inquiry was made of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and answer returned:

Suppose, on all routes where the cost of service amounts to $5,000 from an increase of the trips, or $5,000 from reducing the schedule, the number of trips and schedules were changed to what the same were before the increase, what amount of deficiency will be required to keep the star service to what it now is for the remainder of this fiscal year? The answer to that is as follows:

Star service:
Route on which either additional trip or expedition costs $5,000 or over, July 1, 1878, to June 30, 1879	$1,368,199
From July 1, 1879	810,771
	<hr/> $2,178,970
Cost of above, July 1, 1879, to January 31, 1880, seven months ..	1,271,066
One month's extra pay	181,581
	<hr/> 1,452,647
Rate of cost per annum, December 31, 1879	7,594,095
Deduct $5,000 increases	2,178,970
	<hr/> 5,415,125
Rate of cost per annum exclusive of $5,000 increases
Cost at above rate, July 1, 1879, to January 31, 1880	$3,158,822
Add cost of $5,000 increases for same period	1,452,647
	<hr/> 4,611,469
Amount required for service without $5,000 increases, February 1 to June 30, 1880	1,805,041
	<hr/> 6,416,510
Deduct appropriation	5,900,000
	<hr/> 516,510
Balance required to keep service in operation to June 30, 1880, after discontinuance of all $5,000 increases

His answer supposed the increases should be cut off on the 1st of February last, but as the bill provides that they shall be cut off the 1st of March next, the amount will have to be increased by one month's pay extra, which is $181,581, so that if this bill passes, by the estimate of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, every mile of star service can be paid for at its present efficiency for the balance of this fiscal year on 10,418 routes in the United States, and at the original contract price on these one hundred and seven routes for $698,091 additional appropriation; and if this bill passes it will carry the $698,091, and for new service $100,000, and for increase of service $100,000; total, $898,091. While if we do not pass this bill and cut off this increased service on these one hundred and seven routes, by the estimate of the Postmaster-General we should appropriate for the service the deficiency of $1,720,000, to pay for existing service, and for new service yet to be placed $280,000, total; $2,000,000.

These are the two propositions; that of the committee is $1,100,000 the cheapest. The one hundred and seven routes which the committee propose to cut down $2,200,000 per annum to the original contract price as it was on a part of them on the 1st day of July, 1878, and on a part the 1st day of July, 1879, are situated as follows: In Montana, 7; Wyoming, 3; Colorado, 16; New Mexico, 7; Arizona, 11; Utah, 4; Idaho, 3; Oregon, 8; Nevada, 11; California, 14; Louisiana, 3; Texas, 8; Indian Territory, 4; Kansas, 1; Nebraska, 1; Dakota, 6.

I call attention to the fact that there is not one of these routes east of the Mississippi River, and only one in Kansas and one in Nebraska, and I further call attention to the fact that the service upon this one hundred and seven routes eats up over one-half of the whole appropriation for the star service, costs more than the service upon all the balance of the routes in the United States, 10,418 in number.

Now, I am willing to concede that the Post-Office Department is growing constantly and I want to be not only just but liberal to that Department and all branches of the service connected therewith, but the Department believed six and eighteen months ago, when the contracts were made on these routes, that one millions dollars' worth of service was enough. Now, does anybody believe that the increase of business and development of the country authorize the multiplying of the cost threefold, swelling the cost from $1,000,000 to $3,200,000, equal to one-third of the cost of mail transportation on all the eighty thousand miles of railroads in the United States and one-half of all the cost of the star service in the United States?

Mr. HAZELTON. Has the service been increased on those routes?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Oh, yes. And I will give the gentleman a specimen of how they have been increased.

Mr. HAZELTON. Was the increase necessary?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am not discussing that. It was not necessary eighteen months ago.

Mr. HAZELTON. The question is whether it is necessary now.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. That was sufficient then when the service was contracted for and let. And I will ask whether there has been such an increase in business as to make one million dollars' worth of service swell to $3,200,000.

Mr. HASKELL. If the gentleman will permit me, let me ask a question.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HASKELL. My question is whether the gentleman has not been long enough on the Postal Committee and has not become familiar enough with the star service of the United States to know that many and many a time a route is let and service ordered upon it once a week when every man knows that as soon as the route is surveyed, the line located, the business ascertained, that service must be brought up to six times a week and an expedited schedule? And in view of that well-known fact, I ask is the statement of the gentleman from Illinois a fair statement of this bill?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I know precisely what the gentleman from Kansas has reference to, and I reply to his question by asking another. While I admit the strength and force of what he says as to a route now and then, I ask did he ever know, or did anybody else ever know, that it was necessary to increase one hundred and seven routes in six and twelve months from $1,000,000 compensation in round numbers to $3,200,000? The necessity for increase upon the route in the case put by the gentleman is exceptional, while the increases in fact as made by the Department have become the rule.

Mr. HASKELL. I will answer the gentleman—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I do not yield.

Mr. HASKELL. I thought the gentleman asked me a question, and I desired to answer it.

Mr. HAZELTON. Oh, let him answer the question.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] is making the speech he may let him. A number of gentlemen around me who do not aim to be unkind throw in remarks which are an annoyance, creating confusion, and I prefer not to be interrupted.

Mr. CONGER. Perhaps you will get over that by and by.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. When I am as old as my venerable friend from Michigan, perhaps I may.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed. He declines to be interrupted.

Mr. WRIGHT. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WRIGHT. When a member addressing this House asks another member a question has not that member a right to answer it?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will set the soul of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] at rest by asking the gentleman from Kansas how much time does he want to answer that question?

Mr. HASKELL. I do not desire any gentleman in this House to give up his time to me. I will take care of my own interests. I do not desire to interrupt the gentleman from Illinois. I presume discussion will be permitted in this committee and I will reserve what I have to say until I shall have an opportunity to make remarks on this subject in my own time.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The committee proposes to cut off this increased and expedited service so as to give the original service as it was on the 1st day of July last as to a part of the routes and as it was on the 1st day of July, 1878, on the other parts. Do that and you save over a million of dollars. If you do not do that walk up like men and vote the $1,700,000. There it is. You can take your choice. The committee's bill means $700,000 for existing service and $200,000 for an increase of service; and the other proposition, if you do not adopt the committee's bill and chop off these increases on one hundred and seven routes, means $1,700,000. Now while we are talking about these routes let me give you the facts, not as to the one hundred and seven routes, but let me give you the facts as to twelve routes.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me for one question?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman from Illinois is on the committee, I believe, which is investigating this matter; and if it be not a betrayal of the secrets of that committee, I would ask if there is any evidence before his committee—

Mr. CLYMER. I object.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Let him ask the question.

Mr. CLYMER. The gentleman is not entitled to ask what occurred in committee.

Mr. PAGE. I have not concluded my question. Let me finish it. Is there any evidence before the Appropriations Committee that this service on the one hundred and seven routes is unnecessary?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] make the point of order?

Mr. CLYMER. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PAGE. Then I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if he is in possession as a member of this House of any facts that show it to be unnecessary to continue the appropriations for the one hundred and seven routes as they are now served?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will say to the gentleman my own opinion about it, if he wants that—

Mr. PAGE. I want to know what facts the gentleman has.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman has asked me a question on which the point of order has been made and sustained, and he knows my mouth is closed.

Mr. PAGE. I have changed the question, and have asked the gentleman to make the statement as a member of the House, not as a member of the committee.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will give him my opinion about it.

Mr. PAGE. I am not asking for any information obtained by the investigation.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman seeks, I will not say to pettifog, but to get me to give information when he knows my mouth is sealed by the point of order.

Mr. PAGE. Not at all. I do not ask you for any information obtained by the committee in its investigations.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Very well. My opinion I have already given. It is that this increase of 300 per cent. on these one hundred and seven routes, making these routes eat up one-half of the total appropriations for all the star service in the United States on 10,500 routes, is too large an increase.

Mr. CONGER. Is the increased service on all these routes unnecessary?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I do not at this point.

Mr. CONGER. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman, but we are desirous of obtaining information. If the subject will not bear examination, then let it go.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will ask the Chair a question. Will I be entitled to recognition in my own right after the expiration of this hour?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to be speaking in the time of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] and after that time shall have expired another gentleman will be recognized.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Another gentleman? I thought I was down for recognition in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman to accept the remainder of the time of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to go on in his own right. It was understood that way in the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. My only object in asking the question is that I have been interrupted so frequently, and I desire to give gentlemen all the information I can. If I may be allowed to get through with my statement I will then answer gentlemen if I have the time.

Mr. PAGE. Do I understand from the gentleman of the Committee on Appropriations having charge of this bill [Mr. BLOUNT] that no time will be allowed to those who are opposed to the bill and in favor of making the necessary appropriations to speak on this subject before the five-minute debate shall have commenced?

Mr. BLOUNT. The Committee on Appropriations are anxious to have a fair discussion of this bill; and I will not myself move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing general debate until the bill has been fairly discussed on both sides.

Mr. PAGE. That is satisfactory.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I hold in my hand an official statement made by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General in regard to twelve mail routes of the one hundred and seven routes before mentioned upon which the service is now being performed, which shows the original contract price therefor, where situate, and the increase of pay from additional trips and increased speed, as follows:

THOS. J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

From which it appears that the original contract price on these twelve routes was $248,326, and last year and this, to 1st of January, the cost of same was increased by order of the Post-Office Department $934,990, making the present total cost therefor per annum $1,183,161, an increase in round numbers of $1,000,000. I do not believe the exercise of discretion by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General authorizing such an enormous increase as here made was wise.

As gentlemen seem to be anxious for information I will give one route as a specimen. Take the route from Fort Worth to Yuma. The original contract price, at the time the contract went into force on the 1st day of July, 1878, was $134,000. That was for seven trips per week, and it took seventeen days to make a trip; that is, the schedule time for the trip was seventeen days, and the contract was for daily service. An order was made by the Department reducing that schedule time to thirteen days instead of seventeen days; that is, making the service four days quicker. The increase of cost for that expediting of the service was $165,000, making $300,000 for what before cost $134,000.

Now, I think that the law needs amending, and let me say in justice to the Post-Office Department, for I am not here to do it an injustice, that those in charge of that Department themselves believe the law needs amending, and they have so said in a report to this House asking authority in such cases to terminate the contract and readvertise the service.

And what is true upon this one route is true to a greater or less extent on every one of the one hundred and seven routes. For instance, here is another route, the Vinita and Las Vegas route, through the Indian Territory, which has been increased from $6,000 per annum to $150,000 per annum. But enough of that.

Mr. Chairman, the question has been asked, why decrease the service and the cost thereof on these one hundred and seven routes to what it was when the contract was made therefor, six and eighteen months ago, and permit the increase of service to remain untouched on all the other routes in the United States? In reply I have to say that from an examination of the official tables it appears that the increase on these one hundred and seven routes was extraordinary, and, in my opinion, not wise, while on the other routes the increase was in small amounts, such as was probably legitimately called for by the development of the country and the demands of the service, the increase being in small amounts on many of the ten thousand other routes, in the main from twenty-five to three hundred dollars per annum, and very rarely as great as two thousand or three thousand dollars per annum; in fact, the total increase on all of these ten thousand routes this fiscal year was only $300,000.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to make one inquiry, in order that his argument may be understood?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman has specified one hundred and seven routes where he says there has been an unnecessary increase.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman has also specified the additional cost for increase of service and expedition. Will the gentleman give us the number of miles of those one hundred and seven routes?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I do not know whether the amount is footed or not; I will see.

Mr. BINGHAM. They are one hundred and seven of the largest routes in the service.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. That is true in general, but not true without exception.

Mr. BINGHAM. Can the gentleman give me any idea of the number of miles embraced in these one hundred and seven routes?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will give the gentleman an answer that shall be approximately correct. While I cannot be precisely accurate, I see by glancing at the table that these one hundred and seven routes amount in the aggregate to about twenty-two thousand miles in length.

Mr. BINGHAM. The star service aggregates two hundred and fifteen thousand miles; so that these one hundred and seven routes embrace about one-tenth of the entire star service.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. And cost one-half of the entire appropriation for that service.

Mr. BINGHAM. That I know nothing about.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. In other words, these one hundred and seven routes, one-tenth in length of this service, cost as much as the other ten thousand routes in the United States, nine-tenths in length of the whole service.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not an enemy of the star service in the West. I want that section to have all that it is entitled to legitimately. I believe in fostering the interests of the West, in developing the country; I have always believed in it, and have always advocated it. For that reason in this bill, while we suggest a reduction of this service to what it was at the commencement of last year in cost, we also give power to increase the service as it may be necessary on all routes in the United States, provided the increase does not exceed $5,000 on any one route. I think that provision is about right. I think it probable that in Colorado there are a few routes upon which increases might be proper, and in regard to which the Department ought to have discretion to make proper increases. So perhaps in many other places. In this bill we allow the Department to make an increase in any case, not to exceed $5,000.

Mr. BELFORD. As the gentleman has referred to Colorado will he allow me a single remark?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. BELFORD. I say that under the operation of this bill the people of Colorado will have but one service a week between Pueblo and Rosita, between Fair Play and Helena, and between Helena and Leadville. You propose to take off the daily mail to Leadville, a city of forty thousand population, and under the operation of this bill to give us a weekly mail.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. What is the contract price?

Mr. BELFORD. I think that originally it was $900 when the town had only about twenty-five hundred people. There has been very little increase of the pay for that service since that time, although the population has increased from twenty-five hundred to forty thousand.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. When was the original contract made?

Mr. BELFORD. I understand the original contract was made in 1878. I have a statement here obtained from the Post-Office Department this morning, showing that under the operations of this bill the service will be reduced to one trip a week on the routes I have named.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have said that this bill, if passed, may here and there work hardship in regard to this or that route. But after it is passed, Congress will still be in session; and if there are individual cases of hardship, Congress will have the remedy in its hands. It is necessary in passing a bill of this kind that we should establish some general rule, if we are to make any saving at all. The argument as to the hardships on one or two routes should not avail to drag through this whole increase.

Mr. HUMPHREY. It is not as to one route but as to the whole country that this bill fails to provide a sufficiency of mail service. The Assistant Postmaster-General reduced the service on the 1st of July on several routes within my knowledge.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Where?

Mr. HUMPHREY. In the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. On whose request?

Mr. HUMPHREY. You have me there. [Laughter.] I do not know on whose request.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, ever since I have had a seat in this House I have been surprised whenever this star-service question has come up to see gentlemen from Illinois and Wisconsin, from all over the South and West, rise here and cry out that the star service is going to be interfered with. Now, let me state what is the fact. The gentleman says that the daily service was taken off his little route in Wisconsin on the 1st of July.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Not only one route, but a dozen of them.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. A dozen routes where the service did not cost much—short routes; and the service was taken off for the reason, we are told, that there was not money sufficient.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I say it was taken off under the appropriations for the present fiscal year.

These people in Illinois, Wisconsin, and all over the country, have the right to be sensitive on this question, because the only direct benefit they get from the legislation of Congress is what they receive from the star service.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Now, if I can have order and if the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HUMPHREY] can restrain himself for a few minutes, I will answer him. Does not the gentleman know that since the service was taken off his dozen routes in Wisconsin—short routes that did not cost much—there has been a service costing over $2,000,000 expedited and increased on one hundred and seven routes west of the Mississippi River?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes, I know that; but the bill before us will not allow any increase of service east of the Mississippi. The appropriations in this bill will not allow the Postmaster-General to put back the service as it was before the 1st of July.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I decline to yield further to the gentleman from Wisconsin. I want to give this committee this information: that at the close of the last Congress we passed a post-route bill with two thousand new post-routes upon it; service has been put upon thirteen hundred of those two thousand new routes out of the appropriation for this year at a cost of $430,000; we have provided in this bill an appropriation of $100,000, which at the same rate for the thirteen hundred routes will place the service for the remainder of this fiscal year on the remaining seven hundred routes. I think that takes care of the gentleman's little routes. O, but, says he, I want the service expedited on my little routes up in Wisconsin. I want an increased number of trips!

Mr. HUMPHREY. I have not said that. I want the service up there increased to what it was five years ago.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. This $100,000 for the balance of this year will put it there.

Mr. HUMPHREY. But they say it will not.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. There is $100,000 for new service and there is $100,000 for increased service. That is enough for the remaining four months as shown by the expenditures of the Department.

Let me show the gentleman one other thing. Take the Postmaster-General's reports; run through them for years past and what do you find? You find in States east of the Mississippi River that the decrease in the cost of the star service is frequently more than the increase. You will find it was so last year. A portion of that is eaten up by this enormous increase west of the Mississippi River. Gentlemen east of the Mississippi River are pressed to vote for the star service to get service on their little routes while the maw of these contractors upon these one hundred and seven routes is ever open to swallow one-third, ay, one-half of the total appropriation made for the purpose of carrying the mails.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask my friend from Illinois to allow me to make a statement.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Illinois a moment ago was interrupted by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HUMPHREY] by the statement that they had not the star service in Wisconsin they had four or five years ago. I have before me the report of the Postmaster-General, which shows that in 1877 it was 2.6 and at this time it is 2.78 trips a week, one in 1877 and the other in 1880, showing that the Department is at variance with the gentleman from Wisconsin in his statement that there was an increase instead of a decrease, and that, therefore, the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am not mistaken.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Then the gentleman knows more than the officials.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I do not know what the officials say, but I know the service in my State, which had been daily and had been so for years, was cut down on the 1st of June last to tri-weekly service.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. One word in conclusion on this branch of the subject. I say considering the cost of the service and the reports of the Department $200,000, which we appropriate in terms, will give the gentleman from Wisconsin and every other gentleman the service they ought to have during the remainder of the fiscal year. If the gentleman from Wisconsin or any other gentleman, with the hope of getting service on their little routes, want to vote money at the rate of $3,200,000 a year into the pockets of the contractors on these one hundred and seven routes, well and good. That is their lookout.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I wish they had no little routes in Wisconsin. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLYMER. Then, what are you talking about?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will not antagonize my friend from Wisconsin, because with that wise shake of his head when a gentleman declines to yield to him he gets it anyhow. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. Now I have a right to rise to a personal explanation. [Laughter.] I never did shake my head wisely. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I take the gentleman at his word and will go on with the discussion of the bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I wish I could take the gentleman at his word.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have performed the duty, so far as this bill is concerned, which was laid upon me as one member of the committee from which it was reported. The facts I have given are taken from the official reports of officers of the Post-Office Department. I thought it my duty as respectfully as I knew how to give them to the committee. Now, if some other gentleman can say, in his capacity as a Representative, he can frame a better bill, a wiser, and juster one, and will do it, and the majority of this committee will concur with him, then I have no objection. So far as I am concerned I have wrestled with this question and with the facts in it as best I could, and have concurred in the reporting of this bill, believing it to be the wisest one we could mature. Without any defense of the Post-Office Department, without any attack upon it, I have called the attention of this committee to this deficiency, what it is they estimate, what it is we propose to appropriate. I have given you all the facts, and am content and shall be satisfied with whatever policy the committee may choose to adopt. I will print the table showing the one hundred and seven routes spoken of, with the original contract price and cost of increase, as follows:

Mr. MONEY. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will be allowed to conclude his remarks.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have concluded. I only wanted the privilege of yielding a portion of my time to other gentlemen, but I have no special desire in reference to the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HASKELL. Mr. Chairman, I am not prepared to say that the Post-Office Department officers have in all matters that come before them for their action been wise or unwise in the administration of affairs; but I am prepared to state as my deliberate opinion that this bill now pending before the committee that seeks to remedy an alleged abuse of authority on the part of that Department ought never to be enacted into a law. If we were to admit every allegation made by the members of this committee concerning the Post-Office Department—every one of them—I should still object to the passage of such a measure as this as in any way providing a proper or a certain cure for evils complained of. What does this bill propose to do? It goes on to appropriate all the money that may be needed for the star service of the United States under present contracts. It provides for every route, without any limitation or reservation, except in its practical application to one hundred and seven of the great star routes west of the Mississippi River. How is this?

Why, one gentleman has said that west of the Mississippi the people have received one-half of all of the expenditures of the Government for the support of the star service. I presume that to be true. Why should it not be? It is west of the Mississippi River where the great trade and travel of that section of our country winds its way over wagon-roads where this great mail service on horses is carried. There is the place where the great stage-routes are located; that is where the star service is most needed and where it principally exists. There is no such need of it east of the Mississippi River as there. Of course the heavy expenditures are there.

Another member of this committee says that there is something evidently rotten in this management of the star service as it exists at this time because it costs more to maintain it there than it does east of the Mississippi. Why, sir, what is there remarkable about that? Does the honorable gentleman from Illinois believe that in the fifteen hundred miles lying through the Territory of Arizona, or across the barren waste of the Staked Plain, or reaching out over the summit of the Rocky Mountains, and through its rough and tortuous defiles, where the mails are to be carried daily on snow-shoes through the winter, perhaps to be carried over stretches of one hundred miles without water, across barren wastes, that that service can be performed at the same price that a buggy can be procured to carry the mails across the fertile plains of his own beautiful State of Illinois? And yet this is the argument that has been made here; this is the argument that we are to meet and that is used for the passage of this bill—because the western routes consume so much of the people's money. And we are met with the charge that there is abuse in the service on these routes; that frauds have been perpetrated and practiced continually, and that great wrong has been done to the people of the whole country in consequence. There is not one of them that has brought forward a single argument, not a word of evidence in support of the charge of fraud or abuse.

Take any one of these routes that have been mentioned here, take for instance the Las Vegas and Vinita route, which has been alluded to half a dozen times here. That route was ordered by the Congress of the United States to be established; the Post-Office Department knew nothing about it. It stretches over seven hundred miles of barren—no, not barren, but wild—territory, filled with military posts of the United States, with Indian agencies and scattered ranches of frontiersmen. They let that route by contract, but of course the contractor knew that if he secured it he secured the monopoly of it for four consecutive years, with all the increasing business that would naturally come to the route from the establishment of mail service upon it, and that he could afford to take it at a very low rate.

Men settle upon all mail routes in the West as soon as they are established, and consequently there was much competition for this route, and it was bid off finally at some $6,000. It would have cost $25,000 to put the regular service on that route as often as required and in the manner by the contract. By all the figures that any route ought to have cost, this contractor would have been compelled to pay $25,000 for maintaining service on that route for four consecutive years. But he knew, as every one of the contractors knew, that when a mail-route was put through that country, when these Indian posts were held together by the mail-carrier's trip once a week, when the isolated ranches of the hardy frontiersmen of New Mexico and Texas were once bound together by this mail-carrier route, villages would spring up all along the line; he knew that new post-offices would be located; he knew the service on the route would be largely increased. He had the right to take it into consideration. They all take it into consideration, and they all would be liable to a charge of idiocy if they did not take note of these facts. And just what was supposed to be true was found to be so when the route was opened. The contractor knew there was to be largely increased service in a short time. He could not help knowing it. He would simply have been an idiot not to have known it. Everybody knew it. When he comes to locate his route he sends to some civilized community and buys ferry-boats, builds bridges, shortens the line of the old military trails in one instance as much as a hundred and fifty miles; explores and surveys new routes; locates station-houses, digs wells, prepares his stock, and gathers together all material that he knows he will be called upon in less than four years, under his contract, to have in order to maintain his service, and the increase of the service that is sure to come.

Right in the midst of this comes this bill. After it has been increased, after members of Congress by the score have been down to that Department and begged to have it increased, after the General of the Army has asked to have it increased so that military posts may be connected together, so that news of Indian outrages may be transmitted, so that settlers may have correspondence with each other—after these men have petitioned Congress, after the Board of Trade in Saint Louis have petitioned Congress, and the Merchants' Exchange and the Cotton Exchange and representatives and delegates all through that section of the country have sent in petitions with hundreds and thousands of names, then the Post-Office Department under law—under law, mind you—makes the increase found to be necessary, and orders on the service. What does this bill do? It puts them back without recourse to the original provisions of the original contract. The price paid, for instance, for the purchase of ferry-boats and the building of bridges is more than that original contract, and that is true of the Fort Yuma route; it is true of these twelve great routes; it is true, to a great extent, of the whole one hundred and seven. They have expended more for surveying some of their routes than the whole original contract would have cost. Why? Because while you could dilly-dally on any kind of route with a schedule time of two weeks, for instance, if the time be shortened up to one week you require to have a direct line. Instead of fording a stream in the prairie under a long schedule, you have to build a bridge under a short one. Instead of swimming a horse across a stream with a small mail-sack, you have to buy a ferry-boat for an increased mail and a more rapid transit of it. Instead of "heading" a stream on the prairie on long schedule time, you must cross it by some means on short schedule time.

This bill comes in and cuts off the whole increase of service and takes from these men every cent they have expended to build up their route and remands them back to the old original horseback, pack-saddle method of carrying the United States mails.

Again, have you provided under this bill a remedy to reach the routes which have been enormously increased, and wrongfully? Not at all. Have you put your finger on a fraud and said "We will eliminate that?" No. Have you picked out a large route and said "This costs too much, we will cut it down one-half?" No. Have you examined into the service of any one of these routes and made it pro rata to cost so much per mile? No. But you have cut down the great colossal frame-work of the whole star service west of the Mississippi River and have carried to those great through lines the stagnation of eternal death.

Do you understand, gentlemen of the committee, that these great through routes, that you thus strike at are the feeders of the little routes that run there? Have you increased the service on the little route that branches out from this long one? You put it at six times a week or at three times a week. You expedite it possibly. It is a little route. Its costs very little. But after you have done that all through the State or Territory, after you have increased all the diverging routes, you go to work and drive the great trunk line that supplies them all back to this once a week service.

Take your Fort Yuma and Worth route. On that you have expedited the service. Under the operation of this bill you still leave the daily mail along the Fort Yuma and Worth line. You do not take that away. But on the Las Vegas and Vinita route, equally as important, with as many post-offices, with as much to hope for the future, you remand that back to the old pack-saddle once-a-week service.

Then it was charged here by the members of the committee that the original contract was so small and the increase so great that that increase must be a fraud. The original contract is no criterion at all. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] understands that. He understands that to secure a line, a stage route, a post-route running into a mining country like that of Leadville, or of Tucson, Arizona—in all those localities—a contractor would agree to take service once a week for nothing if he could get it; because he knows, as happened once already in Colorado, that before the time of his contract is out a city or a mining camp will grow up and thousands of men will have to be supplied with the mail and he will get compensation.

Talk of the original contract for a route as being the guide for all subsequent action! I know of one firm, Sanderson & Co., in my State that took a contract to carry Uncle Sam's mail for four years for one cent a year simply to shut out competition and to let the advantages from the future growth and development of the country come to them.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HASKELL. Yes, I will yield.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman refers to a case where the contractors took the service on a particular route for four years, at one cent a year. He says that it was worth much more to do the work, but in order to drive away competition by others and to get the carrying trade on the route they took it for that low price. Now, I want to ask the gentleman where the equity or the right comes in for them to come forward now, in regard to a route upon which they are bound by their contract to perform service, and ask the Government to increase the pay by $100,000 or $150,000 or $175,000 a year?

Mr. HASKELL. They do not ask any such thing. Look at this report and at the very route to which we have had our attention called here so much, the Las Vegas and Vinita route. You say that Brady or the Post-Office Department has committed a fraud on the people of the United States. Now look at the list of names begging for that service.

Mr. CLYMER. Did they name the price to be paid?

Mr. HASKELL. No.

Mr. CLYMER. Of course they did not.

Mr. HASKELL. If you are not satisfied with the price, why not fix the compensation for that route for service seven times a week at so much?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman does not mean to misrepresent me. I have talked about the deficiency; have charged fraud against no man in anything I have said. I have spoken of the facts, and have no charges to make.

Mr. HASKELL. I understand that. That service was put there on the petition of men like myself. I signed the petition for the increase, and I stand here ready to fight for that increase and to maintain the increased service on that line because it ought to be there. Talk about the increased cost of that service through the Indian Territory! The service is two hundred miles from the nearest line of railway on the south and one hundred miles from the nearest line of railway on the north. It runs right through the Indian Territory and is the precursor of the great railroad that is soon to follow it. Is this stage-route and post-route service to be crippled and destroyed by this bill?

Talk about the cost of continuing that service there! Why, sir, thirteen men have died on that line, murdered by the outlaws who have infested it. Government property has been saved by the carrying of the mail through there. Bands of organized desperadoes have been driven from the line of that road. The old mail of the United States once every day stops at the little post-offices and stations along the line of the route, communicating with all the military posts, and connecting the people of those border settlements with their friends in the East. From Fort Elliot in Texas the mail is carried to Saint Louis twenty-four hours ahead of any railroad connection that can otherwise be had. The mail is the advance guard of civilization, and is valuable in a thousand ways other than for the simple transmission of letters. This bill contemplates putting that service back to the original contract price, and practically destroying it completely. If these twelve routes which have been dwelt upon so much to-day have been put at too high a price—

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HASKELL. Certainly.

Mr. COX. The gentleman is discussing this matter with so much candor that I would like to ask him a question for my own satisfaction and for the satisfaction of other gentlemen here. How is it that these contracts, involving an excess of appropriations, are made in defiance of section 3679, I think, of the Revised Statutes? What is the remedy when the Department exceeds the appropriations and acts in defiance of the law?

Mr. HASKELL. Now, I will give you the answer.

Mr. COX. I want a good answer.

Mr. HASKELL. You shall have it. I am glad you have brought up that question. When the 30th day of June next, comes, if any officer of the Post-Office Department has violated the law, then punish him.

Mr. COX. There is no penalty in this section; I wish there was.

Mr. HASKELL. Hold on. Up to the 30th day of June next, the mouths of every one of you are stopped. You say that by stopping the service all over the United States the Department is going to ruin the whole star service. But recollect that you have lodged in the hands of that officer a discretionary power to increase or decrease that service. It is a power lodged there by act of Congress, and you cannot impeach him for exercising it. He may be a fool; he may be an idiot.

Mr. COX. He may be a knave.

Mr. HASKELL. He may be a knave, and use that power unwisely. But you have given him that discretionary power, and until the 30th day of June, 1890, the mouths of every man in this House are stopped against crying about a violation of the law.

Mr. COX. But if he exceeds the appropriation before the time is up, is not that a sort of species of duress upon Congress?

Mr. HASKELL. I think not, for he has not exceeded the appropriation yet.

Mr. COX. I would like to hear why, for I am interested.

Mr. HASKELL. I will tell you why there is no duress upon Congress. Members of Congress secure the passage of post-route bills, and service is to be put on those post-routes at the discretion of the Department. Members of Congress flood the Department with their petitions, and as individuals they promise the officer in charge of this service that Congress will be lenient.

Mr. COX. That is too thin.

Mr. HASKELL. They promise that Congress will take care of the service; that Congress will see that no detriment arises from the exercise of this discretionary power.

Mr. BLOUNT. Where is the evidence of that?

Mr. HASKELL. And if members of Congress have dealt honorably with their official, there is not even the tinge of unwisdom about his acts; there is no crime in any of them; there is no fraud in any of them, and no unwisdom. It is not even unwise, for he has a right to counsel the Congress of the United States as to the service over which he has discretionary power.

Mr. COX. Will my eloquent friend from Kansas give us the evidence showing that Congressmen have used this extra-official influence?

Mr. HASKELL. I will.

Mr. COX. And let the gentleman say whether that influence ought to be potential with the Department or not.

Mr. HASKELL. I will read from the evidence before me.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is barred by the decision of the Chairman. [Laughter.]

Mr. HASKELL. The decision of the Chairman does not bar anything that I may wish to read; for I am not a member of the committee having charge of this subject. I am here in possession of a document. I do not say where it came from, but I propose to use it.

Mr. COX. I do not want the gentleman to hide anything; let him bring out all the facts.

Mr. HASKELL. Here is a list containing the names of nearly every Army officer and pretty nearly every private of all the posts on the line of one of these routes. Then follow the names of the postmasters, the ranchmen, the business men—

Mr. COX. Come down to the Congressmen.

Mr. HASKELL. Oh, I will not read the names of the Congressmen.

I will say, however, that my name is there. [Cries of "Let us have it!" "Read them all!"]

Mr. COX. Out with it.

Mr. HASKELL. My name is attached for one. Here are also the names of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Saint Louis.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I rise to a point of order. If the gentleman is authorized to use at all this document which has somehow come into his hands, (to the use of which I have no objection,) I submit that under the rules of this House, or if not under the rules of the House, at least in fairness, the whole document should come before the Committee of the Whole, with everybody's name and what everybody said.

Mr. HASKELL. Now on that point of order, which I trust will not be taken out of my time, I want to say a word. This document has neither heading nor conclusion. You do not know, and I do not know, that it emanated from any committee. It came into my hands from no committee. I am a member of no committee having charge of the affairs of the Post-Office Department. I choose to incorporate into my speech such passages from this document as I think proper. The book is mine. I will put into my speech whatever portion of it I please, and no more. [Laughter.] We will settle that question right here; for the Chair I know agrees with me. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Then the gentleman proposes to garble the document that he has in his hand; does he?

Mr. HASKELL. No; the gentleman does not propose to garble it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the gentleman has no right to read from that evidence taken before the committee. I make this point because I wish to read from it myself. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] made this objection at an early stage in this debate; and this evidence was barred out. Now the gentleman from Kansas wants to read from it; so do I. I raise the point of order that the gentleman under the decision of the Chair cannot refer to that evidence.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Good!

Mr. HASKELL. I wanted merely to say that this discretionary power is lodged with the Post-Office Department to put the star service where it pleases, when it pleases, and how it pleases, to a very great extent. When, therefore, there comes to the Post-Office Department such a swarm of Congressmen and Senators as I know came in behalf of this route—when there come petitions from the Board of Trade of Saint Louis, the Cotton Exchange, the Merchants' Exchange, from all the officers of the Army on the frontier, from every member of Congress and every territorial Delegate of the surrounding country, is it not fair to assume that the Post-Office Department has a tolerably good backing for its use of this discretionary power? Where can the officials of the Post-Office Department go for advice and counsel in the use of discretionary power if not to such men as are represented on the petitions for this increase of service?

Mr. COX. Now, will my gallant friend answer a question?

Mr. HASKELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. What right has the Post-Office Department, by the influence or the instrumentality of Congressmen or others, to exceed the appropriations made by law.

Mr. HASKELL. The Department has not exceeded the appropriations. To-day there is no deficiency in the Post-Office Department under the law.

Mr. COX. There is a stoppage of the whole business after March.

Mr. HASKELL. There is not a stoppage of the whole business after March.

Mr. HUMPHREY. There has always been a deficiency there.

Mr. COX. Both a moral and a pecuniary deficiency.

Mr. HASKELL. I desire to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. HUMPHREY,] who never "shakes his head wisely," that he has no business to shake it unwisely at me.

Mr. HUMPHREY. If I may interrupt the gentleman from Kansas, I wish to say what I meant was that ever since I have been in Congress there has been a deficiency in the Post-Office Department. Congress has not been willing to give enough for the star service or other branches of the mail service. It is said here that the remedy is with Congress. Now, if I wanted a remedy for anything Congress is the last place I would ever come to.

Mr. HASKELL. I do not yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin or anybody else except for a question. I undertake to say that at the close of the fiscal year, if the operations of the Post-Office Department should correspond with some three months of the preceding year, there would be a deficiency; but there is no deficiency now. I come back to the proposition I submitted a few moments ago, that you have by statute lodged this discretionary power with this officer, and that even if he has exercised that discretion unwisely it does not become any member on this floor to charge him with thievery, robbery, fraud, and violation of the law until such violation has actually taken place.

I understand very well why this bill has been brought here in its present shape. It avoids the unpleasant responsibility of preparing a bill just as it ought to be prepared. By a few general sweeping provisions a million of money can be saved without the necessity of searching out the facts connected with each one of these routes that are to be sacrificed. That is one of the reasons why the bill comes in in its present shape.

If the only object of the committee is to report a bill to this House which will save a million of dollars out of expected, public, needed appropriations the coming year, there is another way to reach it without harming anybody especially. Suppose you take away from these routes which have been expedited, for instance, where the service has been simply made quicker than before—suppose you take that away, and you will save about $300,000, very nearly as much as is sought to be saved under the present bill, and you will save this daily service on these great lines. Here is my friend from Colorado, representing a district covering the whole State of Colorado, with Leadville, which under the operation of this law receives the United States mail but once a week. Take off the expedited service, the quickened service, and leave the number of trips as they are under the present postal regulations, and my friend from Colorado gets his mail seven times a week, once a day. The expedition of the service is chiefly valuable to the passengers on the stage-route. Why will not the committee adopt that plan as a compromise in this matter and save seven hundred or eight hundred thousand dollars, and leave the service of that great western country, with its States and Territories, practically unimpaired?

Another reason why the bill has been brought in was because it will be impossible for a few individual members of Congress to be criticised by their immediate constituents by the passage of such a bill, simply because there is nobody here to represent those Territories who can vote. A gentleman has said on the floor, or intimated, he did not see what interest the gentleman from Kansas had in the Indian and other Territories; that I only had one route in my State which was affected. I wish to say to the gentleman from Illinois those Territories in the United States do not belong to the democratic party, or to the republican party, or to any State; but they do belong to the people of the whole United States of America, and this House ought to deal with them, which in the future are to be the empires of the great American Republic, with more than leniency, ought to deal with them in kindness and with great care. Every reasonable facility ought to be afforded for their growth, development, and social improvement.

They say this increase of service all through is largely in the West. Of course it is. There is where the population goes. There is where the increase, the growth, and development of this nation are, there in the golden West; there the increase of the star service must be expected and must be provided for.

You eastern men, with your railway lines by almost every farm, have no use for star service. You are not affected; your mail comes to you every day. My friend from Connecticut has not a post-route in his State twenty-five miles long. Here are two great routes, one eighteen hundred miles long, and another eight hundred miles long, branching from which, like ribs from the vertebrae, are these little minor auxiliary routes, which, under the operation of this bill, are to be destroyed by having the main stem stricken down, destroyed, or seriously crippled.

Now, sir, I have nothing further to say on this subject except to repeat there are other considerations which should influence this House than the mere cost of carrying the mail upon these star routes. There are other considerations which should induce us to maintain these great trunk lines than the carrying of an occasional letter. They are the great forerunners of civilization. Along the lines of those great Western mail-routes cluster the future villages and cities of a great and prosperous people. These mail-carriers, hardy pioneers of civilization, survey shorter routes, provide ferry-boats, build bridges, open roads. These routes are used by our troops, and by the supply trains for the use of the Army, and for the use of the Indians, as well as for the use of the white men. It will not be ten years from to-day before a half dozen of these routes you are striking down under the operation of this bill will cease to have star service upon them, and the locomotive and the railroad service will take its place.

It is a short-sighted policy, then, by the operation of this bill to materially cripple this whole system. It ought to be increased. Instead of $2,000,000 needed to maintain this service without detriment, $1,000,000 under the amendment I suggest will be sufficient to carry out the present contracts so that nearly all the people along the line of the routes will not be seriously affected. I submit a table showing the cost of some of these routes in 1850 to 1864.

Western mail routes, from 1850 to 1864.

Contract period.	Route.	Distance, miles.	Trips.	Running time.	Pay per annum.	Rate per mile on a basis of once-a-week service.	Cost of a daily service on foregoing basis. Mr. HASKELL. I yield to the gentleman from New York for a few minutes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I think the letters and petitions which my friend referred to put the service back where it was at the last session. I have an impression the Department purposely—I will not say purposely, but very nearly so—asked for bids below the price at which it was being carried under preceding contracts, in order to have some one, some party, some ring solicit increase under the discretionary power given to the Post-Office Department.

If the amount of service carried under the last advertisements was increased, why did not that Department ask to continue the service on the basis then existing on the Prescott and Santa Fé route, which was let July 1, 1879—for how much does the House suppose? For $13,000, and was raised about the middle of August following to $136,000! Is that disputed?

Something ought to be done before we pass any bill on this subject for a thorough investigation of this matter. So far as New York State is concerned we pay our own service. We make a surplus, but there is from two or three to five millions paid in above the cost of service levied on the people generally.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Because the country is behind you.

Mr. COX. New York pays one-third of it.

Mr. HASKELL. I will reserve fifteen minutes of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman yields the floor he yields it altogether, and the Chair will recognize another gentleman.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does the Chair recognize me?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. CLYMER. If there be no objection I will move the committee rise.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will go on now or yield. [Cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. CLYMER. Does the gentleman from Connecticut prefer to go on?

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think this is important business, and I might as well say what I have to say just now. I do not intend to occupy an hour.

The Committee on Appropriations yielded the floor to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] that the debate might be more varied. I think it was wisely done because he has thrown light on this question. I have listened with great pleasure to him. I hope our friends of the West will not suppose that because some of us live a little way east of the Mississippi we have never been in the West and know nothing about the interests of that country. I hope they will not think we have not with them a common right and pleasure in the magnificent progress of that region, and the utmost willingness to vote for anything for their good up to the extreme of liberality. The picture the gentleman from Kansas has drawn of the growth and settlement of the country gave me a thrill of pleasure as keen, I am sure, as any man on this floor could have felt.

Now, sir, last year the Congress of the United States appropriated $5,900,000 for inland mail transportation upon star routes. It was every dollar the Post-Office Department estimated that it wanted. It was given ungrudgingly, with the utmost generosity and freedom, rather justice, I should say—do not call it generosity. The law says the Department shall not exceed that amount, shall not exceed the amount of the appropriation. It is a wise law put upon the statute-book long ago, approved by everybody, indispensable to good government, I may say indispensable to honest government. Without a provision of that sort lived up to, no man can tell what is the bill to be brought in against the Government. Though it has no penalty of the penitentiary attached to it, it has at least the penalty of impeachment. Whether it has that or any other, it is the order of the Department's officer's superior officer. It is the order which I say a good servant of the Government, a gentleman, is bound to obey; bound to obey or give good reason to the contrary.

Are there no emergencies on which he could afford to give an apology for transgressing? Plenty of them. I will make one for the Post-Office Department on this matter. After the appropriation of $5,900,000 was made last winter the Forty-sixth Congress came here in extra session and established two thousand new mail routes; as those things are always done, anybody asking for one can have it. The bill is made up in a lump. The Speaker asks the chairman of the Post-Office Committee, "Is there nothing on this bill but mail routes?" The member having the bill in charge replies, "There is not." Nobody objects, and the bill is declared passed by unanimous consent. Does it follow that there is to be service established on each one of these routes? It is done as a matter of course. You might as well pass that bill presented by the Post-Office Committee which makes every highway in the country a post-route. It is a nominal matter. There are probably some of those two thousand on which service is required.

If the Department had been able to come in here and say that after we had the post-route bill there was a great pressure for some service in newly settled regions, (largely in the new, some in the old,) and though it feared it would get beyond the $5,900,000, it had added considerable service which seemed to be required; and it threw itself upon the generosity of Congress, an appropriation would have been granted cheerfully. If it had said that, I do not think there would be five minutes' discussion here. The offense would have been pardoned, though it still would have been an offense. On the contrary what has the Department done? After getting the $5,900,000 in March, 1879, was a word said here during the extra session as to the rapidly growing necessities of the service? We were here fifteen weeks and there was no application made for an increase. We sat here up to the very last of June, up to the beginning of this current fiscal year, when these movements toward a deficiency were growing in the Department. Five months went on and you come here again, December 1, and you were met by the report of the Postmaster-General dated November 8, which did not say one word about the most important information the Department had in its possession, namely, that it was exceeding the appropriations for one branch of the service at the rate of nearly two millions a year.

There is not a reference to it there that I can find. He speaks of a deficiency of $150,000 for the last year, the year ending June 30, 1879. There is not a word about it that I can find in the statement of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. But on the 8th of December, a month after the regular official annual report is dated, a short message comes in here from the Postmaster-General, with a brief statement from the Second Assistant, asking for $2,000,000 for deficiencies. Why, there is not the courtesy of an explanation. The communication is hardly an inch and a half long, the message asking for a deficiency of two millions. There is a real deficiency of $1,720,000, but he wants the round sum of two millions because there may be something else he may want to do before the time is out, and he may as well take all he can get; therefore he makes it two millions on the whole. That did strike the Appropriations Committee a little aback. It did everybody. It was referred to that committee. We have examined it as well as we can, and have brought in a measure that gives some relief. If it be not in the best form, put it in the best form. If the idea of the gentleman from Kansas that we can strike off the expedited service and get off with something like a million to cover the deficiency be correct, very well. We shall have discharged our duty when we have called your attention to this shameless and defiant infraction of the statutes of the United States. I have said it deliberately. That is what it is; a deficiency amounting to 34 per cent. addition to the appropriation, which was all he asked, and which he was commanded to live within; a deficiency created in the face of clear and imperative statutes forbidding the servants of the Government to exceed the appropriations, or to make contracts for future payments in excess thereof.

Now, what is the excuse? A little excuse is found in the extra routes established last summer, though the Department might have said to anybody: "There was no money given for this; we cannot establish service thereon." And an excuse is sought, as the gentleman from Kansas says, in the incessant importunities of members of Congress. That is deliberately set down as an excuse. Indeed, the Department goes further and says that it granted service as fast as the members of Congress asked for it, supposing they knew what was wanted. The Department deliberately says that. Now, I believe that is unjustified by the facts. I made my little application with the rest. I was refused. I was told the money had run out. It does not seem to have made any difference to the Department whether the money had run out or not. The Department was always equal to the occasion. But I said nothing. I said not one word. That was the end of the law for me.

Is there any member of Congress here who has gone to the Department and told the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to spend a million and a half or two millions more than was appropriated and he would see him through? I do not believe it. I can imagine an extraordinary emergency in which a Congressman might say, "You might do this, and I believe Congress will stand by it anyhow because of the great necessity." But that he has been urged, and has the right to make an excuse that he has been urged, by Congressmen to violate the law to this extent I do not believe. How does this thing come about? I say this increase has not arisen legitimately by reason of this marvelous, this glorious growth in the country of which we have been told.

I will illustrate this point briefly. My case will be rather a supposititious one, but in substance it has its counterpart in a dozen actual cases. We will suppose a route of five hundred miles let for $5,000, the service being once a week and the trip made in seven days. A slow business! That bid and first contract are understood to mean nothing. Sometimes a man takes such a contract because he discounts the future growth of the region and means to make money out of it at a later day. He will underbid in any event, and he thinks he knows what he can make afterward. Then the service is increased to twice a week, and the compensation to $10,000. Then a petition comes in from the ranchmen and the lieutenant of the post and a postmaster, and it is increased to three times a week and $15,000. Then there is another petition, and the service is increased to seven times a week. Seven times five are thirty-five, and the amount gets up to $35,000. There must be terminal stations, superintendents, a good deal of material, and a good deal of money spent whether the service be once a week or seven times, and seven trips do not cost seven times as much as one trip. But what is the next step? It is to expedite the service, as it is called. There is a demand that the mail must be carried through in five days instead of seven. That takes some more drivers and more mules and horses; we cannot tell just how many; the man in the business must be permitted to judge.

And now whose estimate do they take? That of the contractor. One of them that I have seen is about four lines long. The contractor says that he thinks it will take double the number of men and three times the number of mules. How do you suppose they make that additional compensation? If it takes twenty-five men and seventy-five mules to perform the slow service, they add the number of men and the number of mules together, making it one hundred. And if the contractor estimates that it will take one hundred men and three hundred mules to perform the expedited service, they add men and mules together and say as one hundred in the slow service is to four hundred in the faster service so is $35,000 to $140,000, and straightway they order that the contractor who began six months before with $5,000 a year shall now have $140,000. That is the history of innumerable cases.

A MEMBER. For how many years?

Mr. HAWLEY. For too many; always, for aught I know.

Mr. CLYMER. And no competition is allowed.

Mr. HAWLEY. They say that the law requires it. No, it does not. It may be said that the law permits it, but it does not direct it. The law says that the compensation for expedited service shall not exceed pro rata of the additional stock and men required, (shall not exceed $140,000 in the illustration I have given you,) not that it shall always equal it. In some cases—I know of one case of a large and expensive route—the additional compensation was somewhat within the figures. But with all the investigation which I have made I cannot ascertain that the officers of the Department ever take pains to bring it below that pro rata. They give the contractor the full benefit of the pro rata increase, although he has his line established and a large part of his investment must be made whether he drive slowly or fast.

Now, I say that we have a right to object to this conduct of the Department and to bring it to the attention of Congress. It has been claimed by the Department that they have absolutely the right to do as they have. The officials say that the statutes give them the right to put service on these various routes as shall be deemed best for the public interest, entirely according to their discretion.

But I ask is there not a permanent statute forbidding them to exceed appropriations? Certainly there is. But they say they have not exceeded their appropriation. That has been said by the Department this year simply because it has not yet spent the whole $5,900,000 appropriated for this fiscal year. But it has spent so much of it that at the present rate it will be all gone on the 10th day of April. The Department says, however, that if it is really to come to that, if Congress is not going to give them any more money, it will jump in at the last moment and cut down the expenditures so much that they will be enabled to keep within the appropriation. Now could an officer taking that course and managing to keep within his appropriation by destroying his service for the last quarter of a year escape an impeachment on such a plea? I throw not.

Now, suppose an officer sees his appropriation running out and he says: "I will compel Congress to give me more money." Recollect that he has all the while said that he knew he would get more money, and did not care anything about what the Appropriations Committee or anybody else said. He says: "I will compel Congress to give me this money." And then he issues a grand sweeping order, saying that on every single star route in the United States the service shall be cut down to once a week. Could the man escape by that course? I throw not.

I say that an order of that description, coming in the face of this current necessity and pending the consideration by Congress of the question, is an insult to a deliberative body, because the officer knows that he does not mean to do any such thing; he knows that he will not do it. But he knows that the danger of it will bring a thumb-screw to bear on every member of Congress.

He has no right to take this course. I am not hunting for a criminal offense. I do not charge corruption or stealing or anything of that sort. I am pleading for a reasonable, honorable obedience to the law. It is the sworn duty of the officer to keep within the statute. He has the custody of the appropriation, and the common sense of the law is that his fair current rate of expenditure shall be such as will bring him within the appropriation at the end of the year.

It was said by a high officer of the Department, I think it was the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, that so far as the law is concerned he has the right to expend the entire annual appropriation in thirty days. No man can agree to that. Every one knows that the fair meaning of the law is that he shall make the expenditure of the appropriations extend over the entire twelve months. It may be that the expenditures will be less in the beginning of the year. Congress expected that; it estimated for growth, and gave an increased appropriation on the ground that the last month of the twelve would require a larger pro rata expenditure than the first month. We understand all that perfectly well.

When we were here in the extra session until about the last of June, nothing was said to us about a lack of appropriations; but the Department came to us December 8 and asked for two millions, and shortly after New Year's the Second Assistant said that during the first six months of the fiscal year he had spent $3,800,000 of the whole sum appropriated for this service. He has violated the spirit of the law, and I think the letter of the law also. Having spent $3,800,000, they have left only $2,100,000 with which to carry on the service for the remainder of the year, which service at its present rate will involve the expenditure of $3,800,000. By the contracts which they have ventured to make the Department is bound for $3,800,000 for the remainder of this year.

Now, the difference between $2,100,000, the amount they have left, and $3,800,000, the amount for which they are bound, is the deficiency of $1,700,000 which has been created, because that officer has spent in six months $3,800,000, when he had only $5,900,000 to spend in twelve months.

They say that is not a deficiency, because they can "catch up" if Congress does not give them any more money. They say it is not a deficiency, because they have not spent the whole amount of money appropriated. I say it is a deficiency.

There is much more to be said concerning the interesting and curious character of this service. I have devoted myself thus far chiefly to one set of considerations, those pertaining to the manner in which the Department has conducted the service.

We must next consider our present duty and necessity. This being the condition of the service, what are we going to do about it? It will not do for us to say we will make no additional appropriation. We are under duress. I acknowledge it. I am not a free man in voting upon this question. When we made the regular appropriation for this service, we believed it to be sufficient. We are to-day compelled to think differently. We are under duress arising from a series of contracts covering a large amount of new and expedited service; contracts made by our lawful agent. Unless we make an additional appropriation the Department must go on with additional violations of law, or it must stop this branch of the service absolutely. The appropriation as it stands will be exhausted on the 10th of April next. If the contractors are permitted to go on under the existing contracts up to the 1st of July, we shall be bound to pay them. But the Department proposes to give notice of the cessation of those contracts; and in these cases it is bound to give an additional month's compensation. As the money is likely to be exhausted by the 10th of April, this notice must be given on or before the 10th of March. So, that unless an appropriation be made by Congress the Post-Office Department will violate the law if it should spend one dollar upon the star service after the 10th of March.

Mr. ROBINSON. Do the contracts provide for this extra month's pay?

Mr. HAWLEY. Each contractor, as I understand, has the right to one month's extra pay, not under any express provision of law but under one of the regulations of the Department. The law gives the Department the right to make certain regulations. I believe the provision for this compensation is incorporated in so many words in the contracts.

A MEMBER. It is.

Mr. HAWLEY. If not, it is fairly included in the spirit of the contracts. It is right that contractors should have compensation for a sudden, unforeseen termination of a contract when they are not at fault. Thus there will not be a dollar which the Department will have the right to expend after the 10th of March.

In this bill we have proposed such appropriations as seem to us necessary. We have put restrictions upon certain parts of the service where the increase appears to have been extravagant. For example, there are four routes on which the increase within a year or a little more has been $510,000. The total receipts on those routes in one year closing last September were $64,000. The total expenditures upon the routes was over $700,000. I do not say that these mail-routes must always pay for themselves, not at all. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] is right upon this matter. There are many routes where the service cannot pay for itself for many years. But when a contract has been made for service on a particular route once a week or twice a week, when it has been made tolerably easy for the contractor to get through at the rate of four miles an hour for a reasonable compensation, and when upon a route of five hundred miles there may not be five hundred men, in such a case as this, when the inevitable petition comes up from Congressmen and postmasters, and boards of trade and military officers, that the service be expedited, (the contractor being supposed to know nothing about this petition and not to have been concerned in getting it up and circulating it,) when such a petition comes here to the Department, why should not Mr. Brady say, "I am disposed to oblige you; I would like to give you all the service you desire; but seeing that this is a new route, not yet a year old, on which I am spending $30,000, although there are not, perhaps, five hundred people to be accommodated, you must excuse me from expediting this service to six miles, and making it cost $100,000, because if I should do so, my funds would run out; and there are thousands of little routes through the country, of ten, twenty, or fifty miles, that I am anxious to accommodate. Can you not wait a very few months till Congress convenes? Then I will endeavor to get an additional appropriation, so as to expedite the service on your route or make it more frequent." This is an imaginary case, but it indicates what should be the conduct of the Department under such circumstances. In this respect we have a right to call for better administration.

I will cheerfully vote all the money that is needed for mail service in these new portions of the country. I rejoice in their growth. My own part of the country has little interest in the star service. In my district we are all settled compactly and the mail service is mostly done by railroads, with only a few stage-routes. In my State the receipts from the postal service more than pays its expenses by $115,000, but nobody there is jealous of appropriations for the mail service in more sparsely settled sections of the country. I never heard the slightest complaint in this respect. There is not and there ought not to be any local or sectional jealousy over this matter. I simply speak in the interest of fair, manly, obedient administration of the laws. Now, I am willing to give $600,000, $700,000, $800,000, $900,000, $1,000,000 if need be. I know we will get along with very much less than that $2,000,000 demanded, and not wrong anybody. Draw the line where you please. You have heard the case; you will hear more of it; your servants have not obeyed your orders. You must mend the mischief without hurting the people, and then deal with the servants as you please.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask the gentleman to accept an amendment I have prepared to the third section of his bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman will not make the request now. I have not opportunity to examine it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not ask to have it offered now, but only that it be read to the House for information.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will hear it read. I thought the gentleman wanted to offer it at this time.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a point of order, that the bill has not been read by section for amendment, and amendment is not now in order until that has been done.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Kentucky only wants his amendment read for information.

Mr. CONGER. To that I do not object.

Mr. BAKER. I should like to have a substitute read for information. I know it is not in order to offer it at this time.

Mr. WHITE. I hope there will be no objection to the offering of these propositions. We all want information on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the propositions being read?

Mr. CONGER. I do not object to their being read, but I do object to their being considered as pending.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Read my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. The total appropriations under this bill shall not exceed $800,000.

Mr. BAKER. Now read my substitute for the first section.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the sum of $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to meet the expenses of inland mail transportation on star routes for the remainder of the current fiscal year at or within existing contract prices: Provided, That upon any route where there has been an increase of the original contract price during the last or the current fiscal year for expediting the delivery of mails on any such route, the compensation on such route shall be reduced to the terms of the original contract on and after the 1st day of March next; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to require the reduction of the number of trips per week over any such route below the present number.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SCALES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4736) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriations in the transportation of the mails on star routes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PUBLIC LAND COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message, received from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have the honor to transmit herewith the preliminary report and the draught of a bill submitted by the public land commission authorized by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1879. The object of the report and of the bill accompanying it is of such importance that I respectfully commend it to the prompt and earnest consideration of Congress.

R. B. HAYES.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 25, 1880.

Mr. CONVERSE. I move that the message and accompanying documents be printed and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BELFORD. I should like to have that part of the message in reference to mineral lands referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. STEVENSON. I rose for that purpose, to move that that portion of the message relating to mineral lands be referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. CONVERSE. I cannot accept that amendment.

The SPEAKER. But the amendment having been moved the House will have to vote on it.

Mr. CONVERSE. The reason is this: This is one bill, and the gentleman and myself can divide it better after we have seen it in print. If that should be necessary after we have examined it, it can be done. I ask now that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STEVENSON. A portion of this bill and report refers exclusively to mines and mining.

Mr. WARNER. Some thirty sections of it.

Mr. STEVENSON. There will be no trouble between the gentleman and myself. It seems to me that part which refers to mines and mining should be sent to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the message and documents will be ordered to be printed, as both gentlemen seem to agree to that proposition.

The message and accompanying documents were ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the reference of the message and accompanying documents.

Mr. STEVENSON. Without detaining the House, I wish to say I have made this motion under instructions of the Committee on Mines and Mining for the reason I have stated, that a portion of the bill refers to subjects properly under consideration by that committee. The bill is divided into sections, so there can be no question as to what portion shall be referred to the Committee on Public Lands and what portion to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see how this question can be divided.

Mr. STEVENSON. As to the subject-matter?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that after it has been printed it can be referred to the two committees, but the original paper cannot be divided.

Mr. STEVENSON. It can be referred to the respective committees.

The SPEAKER. It might be divided as we divide the President's message, but that question generally goes to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the subject-matter divided in that way. The Chair would suggest that it would be as well to allow this to remain for the present until printed, and the gentleman from Ohio and himself can afterward agree as to the disposition to be made of it.

Mr. WARNER. Include that in the order.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I move the House do now adjourn.

PUBLIC LAND COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting copy of a letter from Major J. W. Powell, a member of the public land commission.

The SPEAKER. This seems to be a communication relating to the same subject as that referred to in the President's communication and the same order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. WARNER. What is that order?

The SPEAKER. That the communication be printed and take the same course as the one just disposed of.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

INLAND MAIL TRANSPORTATION.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, relative to the appropriation for inland mail transportation for the current fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

WASHINGTON AND GEORGETOWN RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a report of the receipts and expenditures of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company for the year 1879; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

ILLUSTRATIONS FOR PATENT OFFICE GAZETTE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, relative to a deficiency in the appropriation for illustrations for the Patent Office Official Gazette; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SPECIAL IMPROVEMENTS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Treasurer of the United States, in regard to the enforcement of the laws relating to assessments for special improvements in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

LOCATION OF REGIMENTS AT GETTYSBURGH.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House resolutions of the department encampment for Pennsylvania, relative to the proposition to mark the location of each regiment at the battle of Gettysburgh; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPRINTING A BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair in behalf of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE FEVRE] asks unanimous consent that House bill No. 4680 may be reprinted for the use of the Committee on Agriculture.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 26, 1880.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to correct the Journal merely by saying that I was paired on the votes in relation to the 5 per cent. bill last evening after five o'clock. Having an engagement, to comply with which I was obliged to leave the Senate Chamber, I was paired with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. SLATER,] who would have voted against the postponement of the bill, while I should have voted for it.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WITHERS. I hold in my hands the petitions of several citizens of Virginia, of Thomas W. McCance, surviving partner of Dunlop, Moncure & Co.; George S. Palmer, William H. Palmer, executor of William Palmer, deceased, John E. Robinson, E. M. Garnett, assignee of Joel B. Watkins; Ann E. Grant, administratrix of James H. Grant, deceased, Garrett F. Watson, surviving partner of Ludlain & Watson, C. Thomas, and Isaac Davenport, jr., surviving partner of Edmunds & Davenport, praying compensation for rent of warehouses, &c. I would state that these are duplicates of petitions which were presented to the Senate at the extra session, but which from some casualty have been misplaced or mislaid. I ask that these duplicates be received and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petitions will be received and so referred.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, presented the petition of M. Reilly and others, citizens of Wheeling, West Virginia, praying the passage of a law to prohibit the use of deleterious compounds in the adulteration of food; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ROLLINS presented the petition of C. C. Rogers and others, citizens of Tilton and Northfield, New Hampshire, praying that the terms of the United States circuit and district courts now held at Exeter, in that State, be removed from thence to the city of Concord, in the same State; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of W. B. Morrill and others, citizens of Rockingham County, New Hampshire, praying for an appropriation of $35,000 for the improvement of the Exeter River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FARLEY presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of the exemption of steam-plows from import duty for the term of five years; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BLAIR presented the petition of C. Y. Durand and other citizens of the third congressional district of Michigan, praying for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, presented the petition of George C. Church and others, merchants, manufacturers, and consumers, praying that the prohibitory duties now levied upon chrome iron ore and bichromate of potash may be removed therefrom; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1343) to authorize the Postmaster-General to make settlement with postmasters for loss of money-order funds, postage-stamps, stamped envelopes, postal cards, and registered letters lost or stolen without fault of postmasters, their employés or deputies, reported it with amendments.

Mr. MAXEY. The bill (S. No. 1345) making provision for erecting a public building at Greenville, South Carolina, was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

It provides for the erection of a building for a post-office and other purposes, but in my judgment it properly belongs to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I ask that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be discharged from its further consideration, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. A resolution of the Legislature of California, remonstrating against a proposed treaty with France, was sent inadvertently to the Committee on Finance. As a bill upon the subject is now before the Senate, I report back the resolution, and ask that it lie on the table.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. BURNSIDE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 313) for the relief of Major Jacob E. Burbank, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS.

Mr. ROLLINS submitted the views of the minority of the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment as to the investigation directed by resolution of the Senate of the 29th of May, 1879, into the alleged violations of sections 1754 and 1755 of the Revised Statutes, in relation to the appointment of wounded soldiers and sailors to civil offices, and also into alleged violations of civil-service reform in the State of Rhode Island; which were ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BAYARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1378) for the relief of John W. Eckles; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BLAIR asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1379) for the relief of David Heustis; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on file in the case, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

AFFAIRS IN ALASKA.

Mr. BLAIR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to report to the Senate any information in the possession of the Navy Department in relation to the present condition of affairs in Alaska.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This day, after the morning hour, was set aside for the delivery of eulogies upon the late Senator from Alabama.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I presume we can go on with the Calendar until the Senators from Alabama appear.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Such was not the understanding. The understanding was that immediately upon the conclusion of the morning-hour business the eulogies should be delivered. The Senator from Alabama will soon be here.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will consult the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] who is just coming into the Chamber. [A pause.] After consulting the Senator from Alabama he consents to let us go on with the Calendar until one o'clock, and will then call up the resolutions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the Calendar under the standing order of the day.

ALBERT V. CONWAY.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 768) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds to Albert V. Conway, substituted trustee, for certain registered United States bonds redeemed or assigned by the Government upon forged assignments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the bill be passed over without losing its place. The bill was up before.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, that is a subject requiring some examination.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

HORTENSIA H. COOK.

The bill (S. No. 66) for the relief of Hortensia H. Cook was announced as next in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When that bill was reached the other day it was passed over. I think it ought to go over now because it involves very important general principles.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was passed over without prejudice.

Mr. WITHERS. It was passed over without prejudice by the courtesy of the Senator from Vermont in consequence of my absence from the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, and I withdraw my objection for the moment in order that the Senator from Virginia may be heard, if he desires.

Mr. WITHERS. The report accompanying the bill sets forth the facts of the case as clearly and succinctly as I am able to state them. This is a bill for the relief of Mrs. Cook, a widow lady, of Alexandria, to enable her to procure from the Treasury of the United States the amount paid into the Treasury for the purchase of some property sold under the direct-tax laws. The property was sold for $400, the amount of tax and costs being a little upward of $7.

The reason why it is necessary that Congress should act upon the bill is that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, which declared invalid certain sales and required that the amount due should be repaid to the purchaser when the purchaser was ejected by a decree of a court, could not be complied with in this case, because the purchaser of the property at the tax sale subsequently purchased the property from the owner, and being himself, therefore, the owner he could not bring a suit to eject himself. But for that difficulty there would have been no trouble whatever in getting the money from the Treasury, as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue states that the money was paid in and has never been refunded. These are simply the facts in the case.

The only other point is in reference to the suggestion made by the Senator from Vermont the other day. I notice that he intimated that these purchases were frequently made for speculative purposes. That was not the case in the present instance. This property which was sold adjoins the residence of Mr. Cook. It was proposed to put up a drinking establishment upon it, and in order to protect himself he repurchased the property again from the owner. The property has cost him $1,200. It would not sell now for half the amount. It is assessed upon the books of Alexandria as being worth $500. Therefore, no speculative element entered into this purchase; and as the purchase money was paid into the Treasury, and as the subsequent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States has declared that it comes within a class of cases in which restitution ought to be made, and as in consequence of the subsequent purchase of the land from the owner of the property it is impossible that Mrs. Cook can bring suit to eject herself from the property, she comes to Congress for relief.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This particular instance is a very small one in itself; but of course it stands upon a principle that should be applied to all cases like it.

So far as the money paid on the purchase in excess of the tax and cost is concerned, if I am correctly informed, the law already makes ample provision for the excess that the United States has obtained being repaid to the party entitled to it.

Mr. WITHERS. That is everything that is asked.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand that to be the law now. If that be so, then there is no occasion for this special bill. If the amount of the tax and the costs was, say altogether not exceeding $100—I only put that for illustration—and the price that the United States got for the land was $400, then it is plain, of course, that the $300 does not belong to the United States, it has no claim to it but it holds it for the party who is entitled, and that is the owner of the lands for whose tax the property was sold, and as I understand it—I may be mistaken—there is no difficulty in point of law in obtaining that money.

This matter of suing in a United States court, or having a judgment of a United States court adverse to the title under the tax purchase, applies to the refunding to the purchaser of the money, that he has paid as a purchaser, and not to paying the overplus of the tax and the costs to the owner of the land.

Mr. WITHERS. If the Senator will permit me, he is mistaken. The bill does not ask for the overplus of the money to be paid to the subsequent purchaser; it simply asks to refund to this party the surplus after paying the tax and costs of the procedure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is, to refund to the purchaser the money that he paid on the purchase?

Mr. WITHERS. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I say is contrary to all sound principles of law or administration.

Mr. WITHERS. I have evidently failed to make myself understood, or I do not understand the Senator. I just now understood him to announce the axiom that where the property was sold and the money turned into the Treasury of the United States, the owner of the property had the right to reclaim from the Treasury of the United States the amount of money thus paid in, less the taxes and costs.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Undoubtedly. He ought to have it.

Mr. WITHERS. That is precisely what this bill proposes now to do.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the Senator says that he is reclaiming it in his character of purchaser as having paid the money. I am speaking of the case of the owner of the land who for one reason or another, either poverty, or absence, or whatever it may be, does not pay his tax and his land is sold and it brings more than the tax and the costs amount to. The money that comes into the hands of the United States on such a sale belongs to the United States so far as the tax and the costs go, and it belongs to the owner of the land so far as the balance goes.

Mr. WITHERS. That is it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And the owner of the land, as the law now is, has a perfect right, as I understand it, to go and get his money in his character as the owner of the land, there being a balance of money received on the sale that does not belong to the United States but belongs to him.

Mr. WITHERS. If the Senator will pardon me, he will find that the difficulty is suggested by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who states that the present law will not enable him to pay this money to the owner for the reason that the purchaser has not been evicted by a judgment of a United States court.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But that has nothing to do with the case, as the Senator states it, at all. In a case where there has not been any suit and where the sale is perfectly valid, so that there is no question about it, and the purchaser takes his land, he has paid his money and he has no right to reclaim it as a purchaser. The owner of the land is the owner of the money that the land brought, after paying the tax and the costs. There cannot be any doubt about that. It appears to me that it would be a strange state of the law of the United States if it required a special act of Congress to give the owner of the land the balance after he had paid all there was charged upon it. If the state of the law is so, then this bill ought to pass; if the state of the law is not so, it ought not to pass, as being entirely unnecessary.

Mr. WITHERS. The object of the bill is to do exactly what the Senator says the law contemplates.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will bear with me to pass the bill over again without prejudice, I should like to look at that law and see how it is, because if the case is such as the Senator from Virginia states, that it is the original owner of the land who wants to get the balance of the money after paying the costs and the tax, if the law now does not provide for his getting it, then of course this bill ought to pass. If the law does now provide for his getting it, then of course the bill ought not to pass. I do not wish to prejudice this small claimant by having the bill go into the sea at the foot of the Calendar, and therefore I ask unanimous consent that it may go over again without prejudice.

Mr. WITHERS. Very well.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Vermont hear me just one moment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator misunderstands the case entirely. The applicant here was the purchaser of the land at the direct-tax sale.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I misunderstood the case from the statement of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. COCKRELL. I knew the Senator misunderstood it. Mr. Cook was the purchaser. He applied to have the purchase money refunded to him, but not having been evicted he could not, under the act of May 9, 1872, get it. Had he been evicted there would have been no controversy; the Commissioner would have paid it to him. The Supreme Court has decided in a similar case that the title was null and void. He, before suffering a technical eviction, bought the land from the original owner, and now the original owner has nothing to do with it. It is the purchaser at the tax sale whose title absolutely failed, and who, rather than be evicted, bought the title from the original owner.

Mr. MAXEY. Subrogating him to the rights of the owner.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I must beg leave to be excused if I deny, with great respect, that the Supreme Court had decided this case. It has decided one case which the Senator has in his mind, and that I have in mine, but it does not by any means follow that it would decide this case as it decided that unless the facts are exactly the same, because the Supreme Court went, I will say with great respect, as it had a right to do, to the extreme verge of the law in the case that it did decide.

Whether the facts in this case, when we get at them, are precisely like those in the case that the Supreme Court decided, remains to be discovered, because this report does not show what they are, where this original owner of the land was, whether anybody tendered the money, or whether he and his agents had any notice of the general rule that the tax commissioners had adopted, (improperly, as the court say,) that they would not receive tenders from anybody except from the owner or his lawfully authorized agent; that they would not receive a tender from a friend or stranger; that would not answer the call of the statute. The Supreme Court held that that was a wrong rule, and in the particular case before them, they decided that the owner was not bound, under the circumstances of that case, by the sale, and that that sale was void. But if a case were to come before the Supreme Court now, where it appeared that this wrong rule of the tax commissioners was one which did not affect the action of the owner of the land or any of his agents or friends, that they knew nothing about it, or knowing about it, did not care anything about it, and did not choose to tender the tax for other reasons, then, in my belief, the Supreme Court would hold that in this case the sale was lawful, if there is no other defect; perhaps there are other defects.

Mr. PRYOR. Will the Senator from Vermont let me interrupt him a moment? By examining the papers the Senator will find the statement of facts in regard to the bill to be that in 1864 the land was sold under the law governing direct taxes, which is familiar to the Senator from Vermont no doubt.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it is.

Mr. PRYOR. The land was sold. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue made and published an order requiring certain specific things to be done according to his idea and construction of the act of 1872, which construction and the announcement of the order based upon that construction the Supreme Court in the case in 18 Wallace, to which the Senator has referred, passed upon, declaring that a sale made under that order was absolutely void. After the order and before the decision this person purchased and obtained a deed from the original owner for his interest in the land, from the man whose land it was who owed the tax for which the land was sold. That original owner conveyed the land to the purchaser, the purchaser giving $800 in order to perfect the title, which he failed to get under the sale made by the Government tax commissioners. Therefore the petitioner now holds not only the certificate upon the settlement made by the Government based upon the law, but he also holds an absolute deed for the very land from the original owner, having paid $800 for it. The object of the bill is to refund to the purchaser under that false sale or illegal sale, as it may be regarded, the amount of money less the amount of tax due on the land.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I understand the proposition which is so ably stated by my honorable friend from Alabama, but I am not able to agree with him in respect of what he understands to be the state of the case, that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States covers this case; because, I repeat, if it should appear in this case that the order or rule of the commissioners (I never heard before that it was published as a proclamation,) was one that did not affect the action of the owner of the land at that time, or any of his agents or friends, then in my judgment, standing up to the decision that the Supreme Court has made, it would not be a case within it. I have had occasion in some previous years to examine this subject with some care, growing out of the place where our soldiers are buried across the river, that is held under a tax sale. The same point has been made against the validity of that sale, and an attempt has been made to bring it within the decision of the Supreme Court and to hold that the United States are not now lawfully the owners, as they bid in the ground at that tax sale, of the graves of our soldiers over here. Therefore I intend to be a little careful myself about establishing any precedent that impugns a tax title under the circumstances that I have stated, and in every case, so far as my vote goes, it will be necessary to show, before I shall vote for a bill that gives to the purchaser or to the owner any relief, (except what the law now entitles him to receive and that is as to the owner to get the balance of the money received from the sale after paying the tax and costs,) that it comes within that decision strictly upon facts that are developed upon proof, before we are to take any action at all.

Mr. PRYOR. I hope the Senator from Virginia will grant the request of the Senator from Vermont, and let the bill lie over.

Mr. WITHERS. I have already indicated my willingness for the bill to go over, in order to give the Senator from Vermont an opportunity to investigate the case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not appealing to the Senator from Virginia, because I wish to aid him in the passage of this bill if it appears to be right and to stand upon the principles that he speaks of, in merely paying over to the original owner of the land the balance of the money derived from the sale after the tax and the costs are paid. That is the duty of the Government, and I think the law provides for it now. If the original owner of the land that was sold has not got this balance he ought to have it. If he sold the land afterward to the present claimant, that did not give the present claimant the right to the money that was due to the original owner of the land. The sale of the land to him would not transfer, as it appears to me, as a first impression, to the purchaser of the land the right of the original owner, if he has not already realized it, to get the balance of the money that is in the Treasury after his tax and the costs are paid.

Therefore there is no need of any confusion upon that subject, if I correctly understand the law; but I do not say that I am sure I do, although it would be amazing if the law were otherwise. If I do not correctly understand the law to be now that the owner of the land at the time of its sale may get, if he has not already, the balance that was due to him, after his tax and the cost were paid, of the money derived from the sale, then I shall be very glad to vote for a bill which does give it to him. But the fact that he afterward sold the land does not, as it appears to me, give to the purchaser any right to claim this money. If we were to give to the purchaser this money the original owner would have a just right, unless he assented to it, to come to the United States and say, "Give it to me; you have been giving away my money." That would seem to me to be very plain.

I did not ask that the bill go over, Mr. President, as a matter of grace from the Senator from Virginia—I have a right to object to it—but if the Senator from Virginia is right in supposing that the object of the bill is merely to restore to the original owner of the land the money that belonged to him, the balance derived from the sale after paying the tax and the costs, or to anybody to whom he has assigned the money by an assignment that binds him, I shall be very glad to help him to pass it.

Mr. McMILLAN. When this case was before the Committee on Claims there were some members of that committee who did not concur in the report. I did not, and I think the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] did not, and upon the ground stated by the Senator from Vermont, that the character of the tax sale had not been adjudicated; that, if it had been, the conveyance of the land by the owner to the purchaser at the tax sale did not operate to transfer the balance in the Treasury which had been paid by the purchaser at the tax sale as the purchase-money of the land. The conveyance of the interest which the owner of the land had in it to the purchaser at the tax sale did not operate, as I look at it without any particular examination of the matter, to convey the cash in the Treasury, or assign the owner's right to the cash in the Treasury to the purchaser at the tax sale.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Would not the right of the purchaser at the tax sale, if he had any right to this money, have been as good without having obtained the title from the original owner as with it?

Mr. McMILLAN. I think it would.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. So that the transfer of title by the original owner to the purchaser at the tax sale does not affect the matter?

Mr. McMILLAN. No, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The purchaser at the tax sale predicates his claim upon the fact that his purchase from the Government gave him no title?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Did the committee conceive that it gave him a title?

Mr. McMILLAN. I did not.

Mr. KERNAN. Let me make an inquiry, merely for information. I understand that Mr. Cook bought this property of his neighbor at a tax sale and paid the money into the Treasury. Since then Mr. Cook has bought from his neighbor the property and taken a deed for it, and he is now in possession, having the title to it.

Mr. McMILLAN. That I understand to be the case.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Minnesota. I understand the Senator to express the belief that the tax sale was void.

Mr. McMILLAN. No; I say that the character of that sale was not adjudicated at all; and we cannot determine the fact that the sale was void or otherwise.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand the report of the committee to be that the tax sale itself was a nullity and conveyed no title to the purchaser.

Mr. McMILLAN. I merely rose to state, as a member of the committee, that I did not assent to the report made. I differ from it, and the grounds upon which I differ I have already stated. The Senator from Wisconsin I think concurred with me in the position that I took.

Mr. BAILEY. Assuming that the sale was void, I would ask whether in the opinion of the Senator the surplus or excess of money paid by the purchaser over the amount of tax belonged to the Government or belonged to the purchaser who was the owner of the land?

Mr. McMILLAN. Well, that is a question that does not arise here until the character of this sale is determined.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand the report of the majority of the committee to determine that the sale was a nullity.

Mr. McMILLAN. I do not understand that there was any adjudication of the sale in this case.

Mr. PRYOR. I will say to the Senator from Tennessee what the history of this case is. The Congress of the United States in 1861 passed a direct-tax law applicable to all the States of the Union. Under a system of distribution specified in the act, Congress laid a tax of $20,000,000 annually. On the 7th of June, 1862, they passed an act either amendatory of or in addition to the act levying the tax, by which provisions were made to enable the Federal Government to collect the tax. It could not execute the direct-tax law in the insurgent States, and this superinduced the act of the 7th of June, 1862. In order to execute the act of 1862 commissioners were provided for. Three commissioners were appointed to execute the direct-tax law in such States as should be recovered or reclaimed from the rebellion, or such parts of such States as might be recovered or reclaimed. In this portion of Virginia the Federal forces seem to have obtained at the time of this sale permanent occupation, so much so that they established a commissioner at that point, Alexandria.

In 1862 there was a direct tax levied on the lands of one Briggs. The amount of the tax was $7.05, including all the costs. To recover that debt the commissioner ordered a sale, and the property was sold under his order. Mr. Cook purchased it at that sale, bidding therefor the sum of $400.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PRYOR. As soon as I get through with my statement.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. PRYOR. For we cannot vote intelligently unless we understand the proposition we are required to vote upon.

It appears and is judicially ascertained that the commissioner who was stationed at Alexandria for the purpose of executing this direct-tax law published an order that the parties should pay the taxes in person, and that no tender and no payment by any one other than the principal and real owner would be received. That order was published. The Supreme Court, in the case of Lacy vs. Irwin, in 18 Wallace, decided a case in which it was judicially ascertained that that was the order. This sale was made under the same circumstances; no tender was made of the $7.05, and the Supreme Court in the case in 18 Wallace determined the question here involved, holding that that order was void, and that all sales made under that order were void sales.

Mr. Cook purchased under that state of affairs in Alexandria at this void sale, on which he paid $400; and afterward, ascertaining that the sale was void for the reason I have stated, he waited upon Briggs and purchased from Briggs the very same property which had been sold at the tax sale, paying him the sum of $800, obtaining from Briggs an absolute deed in fee-simple with warranty guarding against everything except the sale made by the tax commissioner. To perfect his title Cook was induced to make the purchase from Briggs. The tax sale under which he had purchased being a nullity, being absolutely void, he was necessitated, in order to obtain a title or perfect his title, to purchase the property from Briggs and give him $800 therefor. That is the state of the case as shown by the evidence.

I have before me the decision in 18 Wallace which judicially determines the point. I have also before me an act of Congress which is a precedent for this bill in the nineteenth volume of the Statutes at Large, precisely such a case as this. There Congress determined the question that the Government having the purchaser's money over and above his tax, in this case $400 less the $7.05, tax on the land and costs, held it in trust for the real owner, the party who paid it. I differ with the honorable Senator from Vermont; I think the principle of this case and of the case before the Supreme Court in 18 Wallace is precisely the same. The case in 18 Wallace was based upon a practice that obtained under the same order that the supreme court decided to be a nullity and that sales under it were void.

In the nineteenth volume of the Statutes at Large is the act to which I have alluded. A party in just such a case as this applied to Congress and Congress in 1876 refunded to him, he having purchased at a void tax sale the amount of money paid. The point the Senator from Vermont makes as regards making a precedent is disposed of by that case. There the original owner had not been applied to; he had given no deed to the tax-sale purchaser; but the Senate of the United States passed a law in 1876 refunding to the party who had purchased at a void sale the amount of his money over and above the tax and costs, and paid it back upon this fundamental and broad principle that it was money which ex æquo et bono belonged to the party and not to the Government of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator from Alabama will be kind enough to give me a reference to the act of 1876 that he refers to, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. PRYOR. I will. It is volume 19 Statutes at Large, page 470. An act for the relief of Anthony Lawson, surviving partner of the firm of Lawson and Brewis, of Alexandria, Virginia.

Here is the act:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money not otherwise appropriated by law, to pay to Anthony Lawson, the surviving partner of Lawson and Brewis, or to his assignee or personal representative, without interest, the amount of the proceeds of sale for direct taxes due the United States, as aforesaid, of the lot of land on Commerce and West streets, in the city of Alexandria, and State of Virginia, sold to L. E. Chittenden, and evidenced by direct tax-sale certificate numbered 57, dated February 1, 1865; also, of a lot in the same city, on Washington street, numbered 39, sold to Peter G. Henderson, and evidenced by a like certificate, numbered 58, and of same date with the previous one; also, of a lot in the same city, on Royal street, numbered 45, sold to Henry F. Davis, and evidenced by a like certificate, numbered 59, and of same date with the previous one; also, of a lot in the same city, on Cameron street, on which are erected two houses, numbered 67 and 69, sold to Henry F. Davis, and evidenced by a like certificate, numbered 60, and of same date with the previous one; also, of a lot in the same city, on Commerce street, extending back to Payne street, sold to C. W. Campbell, and evidenced by a like certificate, numbered 62, and of same date with the previous one; less, in each case, all the taxes, costs, and legal charges accrued by reason of the sale thereof, as aforesaid.

In this case the Government can protect itself, if you see proper to do so, by an amendment adding the proviso which was in that instance tacked on by the Senate. The very objection which the honorable Senator makes can be met, and met in this way:

Provided, however, That upon the payment of the several sums hereby authorized and directed to be paid as aforesaid, the said Anthony Lawson, his assignee, or personal representatives, shall execute and deliver to any person or persons claiming title under the said sale for the non-payment of direct taxes under the laws aforesaid, a valid deed of quitclaim or release of all title, right, claim, or demand, by reason of the previous ownership of said property by the said firm of Lawson & Brewis, and shall produce the evidence thereof and file the same with the Secretary of the Treasury, unless the same shall be rendered unnecessary by the title being vested in the said Lawson & Brewis, or either of them, by deed or otherwise, from those so claiming under the said tax sale.

The very thing which was required by the act of 1876, in order to entitle the claimant to the relief prayed for in his petition, the very thing which it was legislatively provided he should do, this party has already affirmatively done by obtaining a conveyance from the original owner.

To this act the volume appends this note:

[NOTE BY THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE.—The foregoing act having been presented to the President of the United States for his approval, and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which it originated within the time prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, has become a law without his approval.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would not make much of a precedent; but whether it is a precedent or not would depend on the exact facts. Perhaps in that case Congress was entirely satisfied that the sale was clearly illegal, and for some reason of a special equity, chose to pay back the money to the purchaser, which I think, by the way, is a false principle, but I am not on that just now. All I wish to do now (because this matter will have to go over for further consideration) is to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that under the original direct-tax act, provision was made to pay over to the owner of the land sold the balance of the money derived from the sale after paying the tax and costs. I read from vol. 12, p. 307, section 42:

And all moneys that may remain of the proceeds of such sale, after satisfying the said warrant of distress, and paying the reasonable costs and charges of sale, shall be returned to the proprietor of the lands or real estate sold as aforesaid.

So that in this case the original owner of the land was entitled to receive the moment the accounts were made up the balance of this money after paying the tax and the costs of the sale. It is important to inquire in the first place whether he has received it, because if he received it, any irregularity in the sale would be waived and there would be an end of it; if he has not received it, whether the sale is valid or invalid, he is entitled under this statute to the money prima facie so far as the Department is concerned. If the sale was of a character that was absolutely illegal—and that must in every case depend upon the special facts of that case, and not the special facts of any other—then he would not be dispossessed of his property, he would have it just as he had it before, and would of course, if he took that ground, not be entitled to the balance of the proceeds of sale, because he had not lost anything.

Mr. BAILEY. Who would be entitled to it in that case?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The United States would be entitled to it on the principles that I believe exist in every State of this Union about tax sales and that must exist, because the Government is not a guarantor of title on a tax sale at all.

Mr. BAILEY. I am not speaking of the sum paid for the tax; but who would be entitled to the excess?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is exactly what I am speaking about.

Mr. BAILEY. I would ask the Senator, can the Government pocket that money and use it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is exactly what I am trying to say is as I believe, although I do not know anything about it, the law of Tennessee, as I know it is the law of Vermont and as I believe of every State in this Union; and that is that a tax sale is the sale of whatever the purchaser gets by it, good or bad, and that he buys the chance, if you call it a chance, he buys the property at his own risk, and if he chooses to pay the United States on a sale of that kind $500 and it turns out that he gets nothing by it, he is merely like a man speculating in cotton or anything else, on the rise or fall, like a great many people who buy lawsuits in this country, I am sorry to say—he has made his venture, he has gone to sea, and his ship has come back without any profits. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. I suppose then the doctrine on which the Government acts is this: the Government is to make money, and will make it honestly if it can, but if not honestly, at all events and by all means it will make money! In other words, it will take this man's money and put it into the Treasury!

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not the doctrine at all, Mr. President. If the purchaser who comes to bid at a tax sale in the State of Tennessee chooses to bid, in order to get his chance of holding that property against the owner, one dollar more than the amount of the tax and the costs, he has not got any right to complain if his chance turns out to be a poor one. It is exactly what he engaged to buy. He got all that he did buy, and that was a title the risk of which he took upon himself, if I am right in the proposition that it is a universal principal of law that there is no guarantee on a tax sale, that it is a mere quitclaim so to speak.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of one o'clock has arrived.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let this bill go over for examination.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It goes over, and by special assignment the remainder of the session will be devoted to the delivery of eulogies in memory of the late Senator from Alabama.

DEATH OF SENATOR HOUSTON.

Mr. MORGAN. According to notice heretofore given, Mr. President, I now ask the Senate to dispense with the regular order and to devote a part of this day's session to the consideration of resolutions commemorative of our late associate in this body, GEORGE SMITH HOUSTON, a Senator from Alabama, who died on the 31st day of December, 1879. I ask for the reading of the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with regret of the death of Hon. GEORGE S. HOUSTON, a Senator from the State of Alabama, and extends to the family of the deceased Senator and to the people of Alabama sincere condolence in their bereavement.

Resolved, That the long public service of GEORGE S. HOUSTON has been marked by fidelity to his convictions of duty, by industry and patience in his labors for the public welfare, by distinguished ability in the legislative councils of the United States, and by devoted and wise service to Alabama as governor of that State.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit to the family of the deceased and to the governor of Alabama a copy of these resolutions, with the action of the Senate thereon.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, it is the custom of the Houses of Congress to bring back the memory of those who die while they are in this branch of the public service by resolutions and remarks that reflect the opinions of the survivors as to their personal and official character, and to bestow a last mark of respect upon the deceased.

For other reasons also it is well that we sometimes pause to consider what we are and whither we are traveling. It is not dangerous to the country, nor is it a needless consumption of time that those who are intrusted with the great powers of government are sometimes compelled, through the invasion of these legislative Chambers by the inevitable hand of death, to cease their labors and controversies for a time, and to consider how brief a period is allotted to their usefulness; to consider how it is that only for a moment they can be permitted to enjoy the fruits and honors of their exertions, and how the strongest men stagger under their burdens as they grow with advancing years and become heavier toward the close of even a long life-time. It is upon occasions like this when a man of seventy years has died, all of whose manhood was devoted to honorable public service in high stations, that we appreciate the fact that those labors are of little advantage to the toilers compared with that which inures to posterity. It is on these occasions that we realize that our public acts as law-makers will be impartially scrutinized after we are dead, and after our personal influence in their vindication has ceased; and that nothing in them can bring honor to our memories unless it is just and patriotic.

GEORGE SMITH HOUSTON was born in Williamson County, Tennessee, of an honorable parentage; not wealthy or distinguished, but highly respected for the sort of integrity and strength and purity of character and modesty in asserting their claims to high distinctions that constituted marked virtues among the agricultural classes in the earlier years of this country.

Many great and good men, who have sprung from that class of society, have attained to the highest honors within the gift of the American people. That influence which was exerted over these great men in their childhood has constantly widened and deepened with the current of their lives, and, in its maturity, has afforded to States and to the Union and the people the safest and most virtuous element in American statesmanship.

Senator HOUSTON had attained the age of seventy years, when his course was ended on the last day of the year of our Lord 1879.

The year closed sadly to the people of Alabama when with it a life was closed that had been dutifully spent in their service—a life that they had so recently crowned with the highest honors they could bestow upon him—and when it ended a companionship that was full of comfort and benefit to them.

With the closing year he went quietly away; and, like the passing of the old year into the new, without any interval of time, his life, that ended here, was at once renewed in another sphere. He passed straightway "from death unto life." The evening and the morning came together without an intervening night, and in their union he found himself ushered into the morning of eternity, as we believe, "a just man made perfect."

He came to Alabama when he was a child, and that beautiful land was home to him during all his remaining days. He received an elementary education at an academy in Lauderdale County, and entered a law office as a student. His elementary law course was completed at Harrodsburgh, Kentucky, and he was admitted to the bar in 1831. In 1832 he was elected to represent Lauderdale County in the General Assembly of Alabama. He was laborious and persistent in his legal studies, and diligent and faithful in his professional engagements, so that he was soon appointed, and afterward elected, to the responsible office of circuit solicitor.

From that position he was elected to Congress in 1841. He thus became generally known to the people of the State, that election under the general-ticket system, having been determined by the voters of the entire State. Afterward he was elected to represent a district in the House of Representatives in 1843 and in 1845 and in 1847. In 1849 he declined election and resumed the practice of law. In 1851 he was again elected to Congress and continued to hold his seat by reelection, and for four terms without opposition. In January, 1861, he retired with his colleagues from the House of Representatives, in obedience to the will of the people of Alabama as expressed in their ordinance of secession from the American Union.

The severance of his relations with the American Congress was to him a most painful duty. He had done all in his power to avert the causes that made this step one of imperative duty on his part, but he bowed with reverence to what he believed was the sovereign will of the people of Alabama, and united his fortunes with them "for better or for worse."

In his own opinion, freely expressed, the preservation of the Union of the States was justly to be preferred to any hope of escape by its destruction from the sacrifices which he could then foresee as the result of its perpetuity. He was then a large slaveholder, but he did not permit his conduct to be influenced by what was the almost universal belief that a continuance of the Union would soon result in the destruction of the entire value of that description of property. His opinions as to wise policy were not as strong as his affections toward his people, and he yielded his judgment to his sense of duty to his State.

During the period of the war he devoted much of his time and means to the alleviation of its hardships upon the sufferers in the armies and at home. His sons entered the confederate army and bore themselves with gallantry in many of its fierce conflicts.

In 1865 he was elected to the Senate of the United States by the Legislature of Alabama, but he was not admitted to his seat because his was a State of the American Union that was denied representation in the American Senate.

Again resuming the practice of law he worked earnestly to restore his impaired fortunes and was active in the assistance of the people in the re-establishment of law and order and the building up of their devastated country. His counsels were wise and prudent, and his example of patient assiduity was greatly encouraging to those who desired to bring social order out of confusion and strife. In this he had the moral support of the masses of the people who stood faithfully by him and never doubted his fidelity.

I need not recite the history of that period to recall the events that rendered such services so invaluable to the people of Alabama. They are known and read of all men. I could not now recite them without incurring the suspicion that I am willing to suggest topics that are still matters of political debate, involving crimination and recrimination, at a time when the proprieties of the occasion would preclude a reply. I would do a wrong to the well-known sentiments of Senator HOUSTON by following such a course. One of his highest qualities was a manly and generous indulgence to those who honestly differed with him in opinion.

I would fail, however, to render a just tribute to the dead, and would ignore the control which principle had over his conduct, if I did not say that his guiding light in the dark period of our worst distractions and sufferings in Alabama, which he followed with implicit faith, and asked the people to trust with confidence, was the same that had shone upon his pathway during the whole of his long public life.

He believed in the honesty of the people, and felt always confident of their power to relieve the country of the gravest evils by a faithful observance of the principles of constitutional government that have so long distinguished the democratic party. And when the people of Alabama again called him into their service in 1874 as the governor of the State, he came as a democrat. Regulating his administration by a rigid observance of those principles of government that he had so long cherished, he, and those who were his supporters, have speedily restored the State of Alabama to a condition that is hailed with gratitude by the people of the State, of every class, and that should excite emotions of pride in the breast of every American.

At the expiration of his first term as governor, the people were ready to honor him still further by electing him a second time to the Senate of the United States, but they had again chosen him as governor of the State, and they would not consent to relieve him of that service until he had completed fully the wise course of policy inaugurated during his first term. The people joyfully realized the fact that their future prosperity had been established on an enduring foundation, and that they were much indebted to the wisdom and fidelity of Governor HOUSTON for their deliverance from the worst evils. And when this good and great work had been completed they sent him to the Senate of the United States, where they fondly hoped to enjoy the advantages of his great abilities for yet many years. But death, not entirely unexpected to any man of his age, but not less grievous on that account, has cut him off.

The bitterness of this disappointment is severely felt by all classes of the people of Alabama. He was known in almost every household of the State, and his loss is lamented at every fireside almost, from the stately mansions of the rich down to the humblest cabins of the poor.

This imperfect recital of the more prominent facts that make up the history of a life of three score and ten years, is enough to show that it was full of honorable usefulness. None of the sixty years, from his childhood to the end of his life, was spent in frivolity or dissipation. His time was all occupied with useful preparation and earnest work. His was a life of purpose, whose aim was the performance of duty, and whose coveted reward was honorable success. This he achieved, and his success was sweetened by the answer of a good conscience and made joyful by the approbation of his countrymen.

His mental endowments were of a high order. In its action his mind was vigorous and powerful rather than beautiful and splendid. He was not a genius, if there are such people. He was sufficiently inventive always to find or to discern the safest methods of avoiding evils, and the quickest and least expensive means of escape from them. His mind was active, vigilant, and intense, and was so balanced in judgment, and so guarded against the influence of passionate impulses that he almost infallibly came to correct conclusions. He could safely trust his own convictions and he did trust them, when others who reasoned elaborately were still left in doubt. This faculty was far less the result of close mental discipline than of that excellent organism and balance of mind whose results are so well known and so greatly prized under the homely classification of "good common sense."

It was this easy and regular and correct method of his mental powers in dealing with the problems that were always requiring solution that enabled him to devote so large a part of his time to executive labors rather than to the study of the opinions of other men. He was rich in the wisdom that was born of his own thoughts, reflections, and experiences, and was not ambitious merely to be considered learned in the erudition which is treasured in books. His moral sense was acute and strong. It was the ruling power in his whole life. In every relation to society and in every act of his public or private life he was guided, controlled, and compelled by an unswerving fidelity to his moral convictions.

It is not enough to say of him that he was honest, for in his judgment of men he rated honesty as an indispensable element in every decent character. He ascended to that higher plane of character which all men love to affect but all cannot rightfully claim. He was a just man. He also recognized with pleasure other adornments of the character of a just man, such as ardent and honorable friendship, benevolence, philanthropy, and a spirit of self-sacrifice for the good of others, in reference to the possession of which he had a good reputation. But he could not tolerate a friendship that was tainted with dishonor; he would never have gratified a feeling of benevolence by taking another man's money to bestow it in charities upon his friends, however worthy they might be. He despised the sort of sentimentalism that is ready to decorate itself with the insignia of broken covenants and of rights destroyed in order to illustrate its zeal for religion, or the rights of man, or any cause however good in itself. He abhorred the hypocrisy which drapes itself in the garments of a pretentious philanthropy, and while they drip with the blood of innocent people, shed in wars really waged for power or spoils, proclaims with insolent cant the grand benison—"On earth peace, and good will toward men." He would make no sacrifices in a cause that he did not believe was just, but would spend and be spent in a cause he believed was worthy of his devotion. He was not "generous to a fault," as the apothegm is phrased; he was first just and then generous, according to his reasonable ability. He did not give alms to be seen of men, but he gave them. He did not pray at the street corners, but he prayed fervently.

It is not appropriate perhaps to enter in the sacred circle of his home, and gather there the evidences of the honest nobility of his nature, from the incidents of his interior life; but I may say with propriety, as I do with confidence, that there went forth from his home life a current of principle which was pure in its fountain, and infused into his public life a tone and character that inspired his countrymen with absolute confidence in his integrity as a statesman and public servant. I own to a conception of the character of a true American statesman that is nearly summed up in the public life of GEORGE S. HOUSTON. I do not mean to say of him that he would have been a great leader in times of turbulence or war; or that he excelled in the powers of debate in the halls of legislation; but he had great sagacity and forecast in the avoidance of calamitous evils. And a firm conviction as to the power of the people to sustain their government when the Constitution is permitted to have its just influence; and in their determination, sooner or later, to assert its supremacy in government, was the sheet-anchor of his political faith. He believed in the capacity of the people to achieve every possible success in their aggregate, and in their individual efforts to become prosperous and happy, if they are left as far as practicable to their right of local self-government. He believed in a government that governs as little as is consistent with the general welfare, and that is sensitive to the least infraction of the rights and liberties of the citizen. He believed in the responsibility of the legislative and executive departments to the people for all their public acts, and of the judges for the purity of their judgments. These convictions, supported by an honest reverence for the Constitution, and controlled by a spirit of self-denying restraint on the part of the legislator in reference to the assumption of doubtful powers, comprise a safe creed of American statesmanship. Senator HOUSTON regulated his entire political course in conformity to these principles and rules of conduct. He was among the foremost and most consistent of that class of statesmen of his time who kept a constant watch upon their own conduct and carefully confined the measures they advocated within the boundaries of a strict construction of the powers of Congress.

As chairman of the House Committee of Ways and Means, in which distinguished place he served during several Congresses, he always carefully guarded the people against the imposition of unjust and unnecessary burdens of taxation and kept a close and vigilant watch over public expenditures. This is not always a pleasing task when the hungry expectants of public bounty are sneering in the lobbies and through the press at the parsimony of Congress or when a majority is created by questionable combinations to force the passage of measures that require extraordinary expenditures of the public money. No man was ever more faithful and few could have been more courageous or useful than my late colleague in withstanding all opposition while he defended the rights of the people against licentious measures. As chairman of the House Committee on the Judiciary he evinced a high order of capacity for solving the many delicate and involved questions that are always requiring patient and careful study and exhaustive research by that committee.

In his course in Congress, he was earnestly supported by his constituency. This support was the cheerful tribute of the people to an honest representative and to a faithful, dutiful, and able statesman.

It cannot be said that one part of his congressional course was more distinguished than another, or that he on occasions flamed up with extraordinary exhibitions of power in debate.

It is not needful to the real merit of his reputation as a statesman that this should be said. His history is a constant exhibition of great powers honestly exerted and of the highest duties carefully and faithfully performed.

The sturdy forest oak is not more majestic when its arms are tossed wildly about in its battlings with the storms than it is when the gentlest breezes play through its leafy arbors, as it shelters the earth from the rays of the sun. HOUSTON's life had no startling episodes. It was all devoted to duty, and in its steadfast observance he was able to render a better service to his country than many have done who have employed their great abilities in fomenting the agitations of partisan politics.

I must not do the people of Alabama the injustice to omit an expression of their especial bereavement in the loss of my late colleague as a Senator on this floor, and also of their peculiar gratitude for his services as governor of that State. He was here for so short a period that he had only begun to render that service from which Alabama expected so much of honor and advantage. He was an old man when he came to the Senate, but he had been preserved in such uncommon mental vigor that the people laid upon him with confidence a task that would not have been a light burden in the meridian of his life. We all remember with what cheerfulness he entered upon his duties here, and how zealously he labored to perform them.

The Senate lost an able counselor and a faithful laborer from its body and the country lost a wise legislator and a devoted son when HOUSTON died. Alabama lost a counselor and guide from whose service the people had derived the most important benefits. In 1874, when GEORGE S. HOUSTON was first elected governor of Alabama, the people of that State were in sad need of his services. On that occasion the hour and the man met. A State with near a million inhabitants, possessed of immense resources of wealth only in the infancy of development, at the moment when its leading industry was paralyzed by a radical change in its labor system, lost the control of rightful and intelligent government. Those who were strangers to the people and to the laws governed the State.

The results that speedily followed were an increase of its bonded debt from less than $6,000,000 to more than thirty millions within a period of five years, and the depreciation of the taxable value of property of fully 50 per cent., not estimating what had been lost in slave property. It was impossible that the people could pay interest on so large a sum. The holders of the securities were hopeless of the ability of the State to meet any of its engagements. The people were discouraged, emigration rapidly swept off the population, and all industries were conducted with reference only to the supply of immediate necessities. But I will not enter into further details. It is enough to say that no Christian country had ever been worse governed, and no people had ever more entirely lost confidence in the future of a State. The people were so shut out from the hope of good government, and their condition was so obviously bad, that while they were too weak to change their rulers, and did not attempt to resent the wrongs under which they suffered, the Government of the United States, feeling that American citizens so situated must be in a state bordering on revolt, anticipated such a condition of affairs and sent its armies there to prevent it.

In this way organized injustice and tyranny were supported by organized armies. To restore a State so distracted by malign influences to order and tranquillity, and to give a people so cast down a hope of return to a better condition, was the great work that lay before Governor HOUSTON. It required a statesman to do this work, and a true and courageous patriot to undertake it. HOUSTON was fully competent to the great duty, and nobly did he perform it. His election as governor opened the way to a happy deliverance of the people. He was surrounded by the ablest legislators in the State, who acted in harmony with him in all the great measures that looked to the relief of the people. He was supported by an able, honest, and enlightened judiciary, and the people gathered about him and gave him their confidence without reserve. A new constitution was ordained by the people. Its provisions will be referred to while republican forms of government survive as a pure, simple, and most excellent body of organic law. The public debt was then arranged to the satisfaction of our creditors, through a commission of which Governor HOUSTON was chairman and Tristram B. Bethea and Levi W. Lawler were members. The people of Alabama gratefully appreciate their useful and arduous labors, which have removed a barrier to their progress that threatened to destroy every industry.

Almost with the day of HOUSTON's first inauguration as governor the glow of returning prosperity began to manifest itself in every part of the State. Confidence took the place of distrust, and the people, with a new hope and increased energies, went to work to rebuild a ruined State.

Governor HOUSTON did not live to see the full realization of this good work he had so carefully inaugurated. Had he lived another seventy years he would not have witnessed its full benefit to his country. Every industry in Alabama is now in a prosperous condition, and her credit is above par for gold. Her people are peaceful and happy and the laws are obeyed with cheerfulness by all classes of society.

The methods of government so happily exemplified in the renewed life of this great State, and so successfully employed by Governor HOUSTON, were the result of the faithful application of principles which for more than twenty years were his guide as a representative in the Federal Congress. It was the earnest hope of his declining years to enjoy the realized assurance that the people will never lose their rights or liberties, and that the country will never again be agitated with sectional strifes. He was full of confidence that if they will hold their rulers to accountability for their public acts and will follow such leaders as deny to themselves the right to usurp powers not granted to them, and who are not ready to appropriate to themselves powers that are doubtful, the people will remain forever free.

I claim that men such as GEORGE S. HOUSTON are true American statesmen. The people estimate their value as being above that of those men of genius whose active and aggressive spirits constantly tempt them into fields of experimental adventure that are filled with dangers to their liberties. A love of glory, a selfish love of power for the advancement of personal aims, is not compatible with a just and safe administration of the enormous powers that are intrusted to our Federal rulers. This is uniformly the judgment of the people when it is not swayed by some great national excitement.

In the history of our Government, when the people have had a fair opportunity for deliberate reflection, they have chosen their Presidents from that class of statesmen who obey the popular will when constitutionally expressed, who revere the Constitution of the United States, and who are forbearing in the exercise of powers not clearly conferred upon them. Though GEORGE S. HOUSTON may not have been great enough to rule a free people at the expense of their liberties, he was great in his fortitude, ability, and zeal in their defense. In the roll of Senators from Alabama who preceded him to the tomb there are worthy and illustrious names. None of them could have been great as the enemies of constitutional liberty, but they were all great as its defenders.

I doubt if any State has given to the public service within a like period twelve statesmen in the Senate who have done more to advance our country in its vigorous growth or who have contributed more of wisdom toward shaping its policy, or more of fidelity to the guardianship of the constitutional rights of the States and the people.

We reverently acknowledge the right of GEORGE S. HOUSTON, which is claimed for his memory by the people of Alabama, to have his name inscribed in a place of honor on the roll of her most distinguished sons. The name of GEORGE S. HOUSTON will ever be most worthily associated in our history as a State, and will be recalled by the people of Alabama with emotions of pride and gratitude along with the names of William R. King, John W. Walker, John McKinley, Israel Pickens, Gabriel Moore, Clement C. Clay, Arthur P. Bagby, Benjamin Fitzpatrick, Dixon H. Lewis, Jeremiah Clemens, and George Goldthwaite, who were his predecessors in the Senate.

With just pride I place his example before young men of the country, and with confidence I ask them to follow it. Nothing is required to be said of him to increase the love of the people of Alabama toward him, or to make his memory more endeared to them. They will never forget that GEORGE S. HOUSTON and his compatriots saved their beautiful State from degradation and ruin. His life was simple, earnest, and just; his devotion to his country was perfect; he left no duty intentionally neglected or carelessly performed; his record is free from the tarnish of the least reproach; his aspirations were for the good of his countrymen; his ambition was honorable, his success was eminent, and his fame will be excellent and enduring.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I rise to second the resolutions which have been introduced by the Senator from Alabama, and thus to add my approval of the expression which they contain of the eminent life and services of the late Senator to which they refer. I formed that opinion by an acquaintance running through more than a third of a century, and an acquaintance which, from the peculiar condition of things, was at one time close and intimate. We were members of the same political organization, and there was that condition of things existing in that organization which brought us in close personal intimacy.

I thus knew the late Senator well; and in all that long acquaintance it is a pleasure to remember that there was no period of time when that intimacy was disturbed. And it is from that long acquaintance and from an accurate knowledge of the public life and services of the man, that I state most cheerfully and cordially that there is not one word in the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Alabama which does not meet the approval of my judgment and my heart.

At a later period the deceased Senator and myself disagreed in political matters. We were as wide apart, as far asunder as the poles; but of that disagreement it would be unbecoming and would be in want of all good taste for me to speak, and I trust I am incapable of marring propriety of this occasion by attempting to do so. But in manly honesty I may say that I accord to the late Senator, as I do to all others, the right of judgment, opinion, and action, and honesty of purpose to the precise degree that I claim it for myself. We disagreed, but in that disagreement there was no disturbance of our social relations.

What the Senator, his late colleague, has said in relation to the general character of the man has been most truthfully expressed, and has, indeed, deprived me of the few words that I would have uttered, as they would be little else than repetition. But one point in the life and character of our departed friend, upon which the Senator has not dwelt and which I think was a leading characteristic, was the sincerity of his purpose and of the convictions upon which he acted. It was that which made him eminent; it was that which gave him success.

As the world defines the term, he was not an orator; but he was more; he was a man of convictions, and upon convictions produced results. The man who stands before the world beaming all over with the honest convictions of his heart is more than a match for oratory and logic combined; he reaches the heart, and the heart carries the head captive. Such a man was GEORGE S. HOUSTON.

He won his victories by his honesty and the sincerity of his purposes, and he made men come to him because they believed him honest, not only because he was one of nature's noblemen but because they felt the impress of that sincerity of conviction in his heart which flowed from his tongue.

What is oratory is a thing which it would be very hard to define. That which produces results is of vastly more importance than that which the world may call oratory, and GEORGE S. HOUSTON, by his industry and by the sterling good sense which he possessed, has left the impress of his mind upon the statutes of the country and his memory will live in its history.

We to-day, sir, are paying a tribute to the memory of that man which is only commensurate with the eminent life and services which he devoted to the country in the councils of the nation. True, the Senator from Alabama has told us that State has contributed to the councils of the nation her just proportion of eminent and distinguished men. She has contributed to this body a Bagby—and I am speaking now, sir, of those only with whom I was personally acquainted—a Bagby, who stood here among the foremost as a wise, an able, and a safe counselor in the administration of the Government and in the framing and shaping of its laws, and was transferred to the diplomatic service of the Government. She contributed a King, whose presence graced this body, and who, by his experience and his ability, aided vastly in so directing the affairs of the Government that they should redound to the glory and promote the best interests of all. He remained in the Senate until he became its father, was thence promoted to the chair, Mr. President, which you so ably fill, and, as I believe I may say, so acceptably to the whole body. He took and subscribed the oath of office, but never entered upon the discharge of its duties, having been called from earth within a few weeks by an inscrutable Providence. She contributed a Lewis, whose wisdom was sought as an oracle by those beyond the limits of his own State, and was often followed. She contributed, not to this body but to the other, one of the most eloquent men whom I have ever met, (and in this I am quite sure the only Senator in this body who with me will personally remember him will concur,) Yancey, with his impassioned eloquence, who challenged and commanded the attention in thoughts that breathed and words that burned, if he did not convince the judgment.

These are some of the distinguished men of Alabama whom I have personally known; and to this galaxy of stars I say that the name of GEORGE S. HOUSTON should be added—differing in character, but in no sense less important. The State of Alabama should cherish his memory and place his name among the foremost men of the State, and we Senators to-day should imitate his example of sincerity of purpose, of honesty of conviction, of untiring zeal, and an industry that never faltered in seeing that all the affairs of the Government were rightfully and economically administered.

Alabama should cherish with affection and remember GEORGE S. HOUSTON so long as she shall remember any of her distinguished sons, and while we may imitate all that was good and noble and generous in the deceased Senator, if he like all of us shall have committed his errors, let them slumber in the grave with himself and be forgotten, and let us apply that old maxim, so old that I almost dislike to quote it, had it not been sanctioned by time and hallowed by the best of men—De mortuis nil nisi bonum.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, most of us, when we cross the threshold of this Chamber to present our commissions, have passed the meridian line of life and reached that period when the shadows of declining years lengthen fast. We are few in number, and the contact of daily association draws us near together, for whatever may be the asperities of party strife, it is to the honor of all sides that when debate stops personal intercourse is not disturbed.

Hence it is that a vacant chair in this small body, draped in mourning, touches us all as a family bereavement. We look around and miss the familiar face and the friendly voice, and by a beautiful instinct of man's better nature we recall the virtues, the generous qualities, the earnest devotion, and the fidelity to duty, of the Senator who has gone, as all must hope, to eternal reward.

It was not my privilege to know personally the late GEORGE S. HOUSTON, whose loss we deplore and whose memory is so justly cherished, until we met here less than a year ago. The honorable ambition of his long and eminent career in the public service had been to close it in this Chamber. He was permitted to attain the object of his pride, and to wear becomingly the distinction he had won for a few short months, and then in the order of God's wise providence he was summoned away.

Should we not all, and especially those of us who are on the descending grade of life, pause to consider how brief at best are the joys of ambition, and how much nobler and more enduring are the prizes in other spheres of human action, consecrated to duty as we are instructed to follow it. Ambition achieved, how few after all reach up to the public expectation! In all history before and since the Christian era how many names stand out as distinctively great? Dull chronology records our presence here and elsewhere, and the waves of oblivion roll over us, as they have rolled over untold millions in past generations.

According to his biographer, Mr. HOUSTON had nearly attained to the age allotted by the Psalmist as man's limit of existence.

He entered public life at the dawn of manhood, and he only parted from it when he bade us farewell for the last time. As a young man he was a member of the Legislature, and for eighteen years he filled a seat in the House of Representatives with recognized credit, attested by his appointment at the head of the foremost committees. Subsequently other honors were tendered to him by the people whose affection and whose confidence he enjoyed without interruption.

His last service before coming to the Senate was to repair, as governor of the State, the ravages which civil war and misrule had inflicted. In his sojourn here we saw him, as those who knew him best had seen him, all through a career covering first and last almost half a century.

He was proud to be Senator, but the distinction never lifted him up with any false notion, or changed in the least degree that simplicity and integrity of character which seemed to stand out and to invite trust and respect. His mind was not of a brilliant order, nor was his speech eloquent, in the sense of oratory. He belonged to that class of men whose practical wisdom and whose solid sense govern the councils of nations, and who rule cabinets in which they do not appear.

Forty years ago, when the professional reformer was unknown in politics, and when the abuses that gave him an excuse to live were not common, Mr. HOUSTON was a sincere and an earnest advocate of economy, as a principle to be rigidly asserted and enforced in the administration of public affairs. He sought to maintain a pure and a plain government after the manner of the fathers. He despised shams, and he opposed official pomp and parade. Devoted to this idea, he was consistent in its support, careful to be right, and conscientiously firm, when a conclusion was reached. His public character might perhaps be best described as that of an upright, sound, and faithful legislator, whose example in all times is worthy of the best emulation and whose life is a valuable instruction.

An unspotted private fame harmonized with these qualities of the public man, so that as citizen, as Representative, and as Senator, he was tried and found to be worthy.

As we pass from these scenes, and look forward to the not distant day when the sad duty which is now discharged for our departed brother must be performed for others, may we all be as unsullied in our great office as he was, and as deserving of even so poor a tribute as I have offered to his memory.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, my acquaintance with our deceased brother began when I took my seat in the House of Representatives in the Twenty-ninth Congress. He had then been for four years a member of that House, and had become a man of mark and influence. He was regarded by all who knew him as a man of excellent understanding, sterling integrity, great industry, and most amiable manners. He was a member of what was then considered the great committee of the House—the Committee of Ways and Means—which then discharged the duties that are now performed by that committee and by the Committee on Appropriations; and I happen to know that its distinguished and very able chairman, General McKay, of North Carolina, regarded him as one of its most industrious and useful members.

Mr. President, it is unnecessary for me to follow Mr. HOUSTON in his subsequent distinguished career. It has been portrayed in the remarks of those who have preceded me far better than I could portray it. A man who enjoyed the confidence of his constituents in so high a degree that he was nine times elected a Representative in Congress, and in five instances without opposition; was twice elected a member of this body, was chosen governor of his State by a decided majority at a time of great difficulty, and when the counsels and services of her best and wisest men were needed, could not have been a man of mere ordinary ability or standing. No, sir; he must have possessed, he did possess, qualities that eminently fitted him for public service under a republican form of government, to which he was so much attached, and which caused his death to be deplored by all the people of his State, and not by them alone, but by all who have heard of his virtues and regret to see a good and great man fall.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, with the late Senator HOUSTON I had no acquaintance until he became a member of this body. From what I had heard and known of his public life I had previously formed a high estimate of his character, an estimate which was fully justified by all I saw of him during his brief service in the Senate. Association with him upon two of the standing committees of the Senate afforded me the opportunity of observing the elements of his character, which for a period of more than forty years secured for him the uninterrupted confidence of the people of his State.

Senator HOUSTON entered public life at an early age and was almost continuously thereafter connected with public affairs. He filled the highest and most responsible positions in the State in which he lived, among others was twice elected to the gubernatorial office, and for nearly twenty years represented the congressional district in which he resided in the other House of Congress. Of the manner in which he discharged the duties of the various positions he held I need not here speak. His election to the Senate after more than forty years spent in public life is proof of his fidelity to every trust as well as the recognition of his services and worth by those he had served so long and so well. Few men have been able to maintain for so great a period their hold on popular favor. Neither integrity of character nor the faithful discharge of public duty is at all times able to protect against the shafts of envy or the intrigues of ambitious rivalry. The retention by the late Senator of the unabated confidence of the people among whom he lived and in whose service he had spent his life is at once the proof of his merit and his highest eulogy.

A brief acquaintance with Mr. HOUSTON was sufficient to understand the traits of his character which gave him a controlling influence with the people of his State. He was a man of remarkably sound judgment, which gave to his opinions great weight and assisted in the formation of public sentiment on all questions affecting the interests of the State. Endowed by nature with strong intellectual power and dependent in early life for success upon himself, he was cautious in the expression of opinions upon public questions until he had investigated the subject to which they related. His conclusions, formed by reflection and examination, were usually found to be correct, and not only controlled his own action but influenced largely the views and action of others. He was a man of marked decision of character, and impressed others with his honesty by a steadfast adherence to his convictions. He was not, however, intolerant or censorious toward others, but conceded to all the same independence of thought and action which he exercised himself. His firmness in the maintenance of his own views was not the result of too high an estimate of self or too mean an opinion of others, and evinced neither bigotry nor the want of a proper respect for those with whom he differed. Frankness and candor marked throughout his life his intercourse with the people of his State. Concealment was no part of his nature. He was honest with himself and candid with others. He sought no disguises and resorted to no subterfuges, but avowed with manly courage the views he entertained and the purposes he sought to accomplish. Nothing detracts more from character than duplicity, and nothing commands more universal respect than frankness and honesty. Senator HOUSTON was never misunderstood by friends or opponents, and commanded the admiration of both by the candor exhibited as well in public as in private life. He stood revealed in his true character before the people of his State, and was trusted for his integrity and loved for his honesty. He was faithful to every trust, discharging the obligations imposed by the positions in which he was placed, not only willingly but cheerfully, shunning neither the labors or responsibilities which they entailed.

As chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in the House of Representatives his assiduity and industry were proverbial. I have heard it said that he familiarized himself with the details of every bill brought forward by the committee and was prepared at all times to furnish required information upon the measures under his charge and to give a satisfactory explanation of the reasons controlling the committee in their presentation. He came into the Senate at an advanced period of life, with energies doubtless somewhat relaxed by the weight of years and the labors of a long public service; yet he was punctual in his attendance in the Senate and attentive to the business under consideration. He was likewise prompt in the discharge of the duties assigned him by the committees of the body of which he was a member, and his opinions both in the Senate and in committee commanded the respectful attention of his associates. During his last illness, I am informed, his thoughts frequently turned to his duties here. In a letter which I received from him after the commencement of the present session he expressed the hope that he should be with us in a few days and ready to perform any duty assigned him by one of the committees to which he referred. He was social and genial in his nature, free alike from austerity and undue familiarity. Mr. HOUSTON was warmly attached to his friends, and in his intercourse with them sought to contribute to their happiness as much as secure his own. There was nothing selfish in his attachments. He regarded his friends too highly to estimate their value by services to himself, and some of his most cherished friendships were based alone upon common sympathies and congeniality of temper and disposition. Toward those with whom he differed he was generous and charitable; no traces of malevolence mars the record of his life, which was singularly free from those asperities which too often embitter the lives of public men.

The close of a life well spent, like the setting sun, reflects back an influence on the world behind. For long years to come the people of Alabama will cherish with just pride the memory of one they delighted to honor and whose services contributed so largely to the prosperity of the State. I shall not obtrude upon the domestic circle to speak of him as a husband and father. Others who know him better will speak of him in that character. In his home centered his greatest interest, and to his wife and children were given his tenderest thoughts and warmest affections. No words of sympathy can mitigate their grief or repair the loss they have sustained. To them he has left an unsullied memory, a noble example, and an honored name, and to the people of his State the results of a life devoted to their service.

Senators, the death of one so lately in our midst admonishes us of our own mortality and the approach of that inevitable hour that awaits us all. May we so "number our days" that we shall each be ready for the summons when it comes.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I cannot speak, as others have spoken, of this dead Senator, as one who knew him in the daily walks of his long public life, or in the sacred circle of his family and home. But I knew him well, I esteemed him greatly, I loved him much; and I cannot refrain from adding my leaflet to the rich garlands which appreciation and good-will are to-day placing on his grave.

No marble marks his couch of lowly sleep,
But living statues there are seen to weep.
Affection's semblance bends not o'er his tomb;
Affection's self deplores his sudden doom.

When I entered Congress, young in years, still younger in experience, I found him an old and honored member, enjoying the honors and wielding the powers of our party organization. We sat in the old Chamber sanctified by so many memories, which has since been made our Walhalla—the temple of our immortals. My seat was near him, and our association there gave rise to a friendship which was as fresh and warm when we met at the extra session last spring as when we parted in sadness in 1861. In that long interval I had seen him but twice—once, for a moment, when he came to Washington on an errand of mercy, and once again when as governor his practical good sense was rescuing Alabama from the accumulated evils of reconstruction. He was serious, earnest, industrious, patient, painstaking, honest, in the consideration of public questions. After investigation he was clear, decided, firm, undoubting in his conclusions. He was unswerving in carrying those conclusions into execution.

A strong sense of duty was the foundation and the mainspring of his investigation and his action. He never wavered between duty and inclination. He never gave to party or to self what was meant for country and mankind.

If his intellectual powers did not reach the highest realms where genius sits enthroned, their steadfastness, their steady impulsion toward the truth, the moral qualities which lay beneath their activities, gave to their exercise the widest range of practical usefulness.

He had knowledge which comes from close study and keen observation. He had judgment which accurately collates all knowledge and discerns the end from the beginning. He had wisdom which, seeing both, chooses the better way. He was courteous and gentle and kind. Even in his short career on this floor, his simple, gentle manners showed to us all—

That best portion of a good man's life,
His little, nameless, unremembered acts
Of kindness and of love.

For he had mastered that Divine charity which teaches—

Never to blend our pleasure, or our pride,
With sorrow of the meanest thing that feels.

He was modesty itself, and shrunk from self-assertion as if it were almost a crime.

I dare not enter the sacred circle of a loving family, or disturb with stranger's accents the silent sorrow of a stricken fireside. There his kind and genial and cheery nature evoked a pious gladness like that which the gay carol and the joyous flight of the morning lark express as its hymn of praise:

Type of the wise who soar but do not roam,
True to the kindred points of Heaven and home.

Mr. President, in the presence of this death, coming to one so full of honors and of years, the friend of us all, the loved associate of some, we must pause.

'Tis greatly wise to talk with our past hours,
And ask them what report they bore to heaven.

This is the converse which needs no speech. It is the communion which we must have with our own hearts, and be still. It is the introspection which Plato coveted:

Thou gazest on the stars,
My soul!
Oh, gladly would I be
Yon starry skies with thousand eyes,
That I might gaze on thee!

It is the introspection which, if we are faithful, will in the end compel our awakened spirits to hear and to heed the admonition:

Mourn not the perishing of each fair toy;
Ye were ordained to do, not to enjoy!
To suffer, which is nobler than to dare.
A sacred burden is the life ye bear;
Look on it, lift it, bear it solemnly.
Stand up and walk beneath it steadfastly:
Fail not for sorrow, falter not for sin,
But onward, upward, till the goal ye win.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, this occasion adds further gloom and deepens the grief which I have heretofore felt and which is necessarily further intensified by my surroundings. Occupying, as I do, the seat of my departed friend and companion, Hon. GEORGE S. HOUSTON, whom by mysterious and unaccountable events in God's providence I have the honor to immediately succeed, while this is true, it is nevertheless proper and, as I am advised, within the usage of this body, that I, too, in conjunction with other Senators, should express regret on account of his loss to this Chamber, and as a citizen contribute a tear to that stream of sorrow that flows through the heart of the people of his State, who are sorely bereaved by the death of their trusted adviser, leader, and representative. Therefore, in addition to the just and touching remarks of other Senators, I ask to submit some facts from which I deduce the conclusion which I shall hereafter announce, that makes up the supremacy of the deceased as a citizen and statesman. I was intimately acquainted and closely connected with Senator HOUSTON for forty years. Living in the same town, county, and State, a portion of this time I was a member of his family, ate at the same table, and slept under the same roof; we were practicing lawyers at the same bar, and partners for many years in the practice, members of the same political party, and in each and every relationship upon the most cordial and confidential terms, with frequent interchange of views and opinions, and in which he disclosed his political sentiments, opinions, desires, hopes and fears. And, now, Mr. President and Senators, with these means and from those opportunities I am prepared to affirm and claim for the deceased that he was a man free from deformity of mind, body, and heart. He was a man impressive and imposing in his personal appearance. His mind was vigorous, analytical, quick of perception, searching, sufficiently inquisitive, detective and discriminative. A mind that came to conclusions slowly but certainly, not because of its dullness but because of its caution, its prudence, its sense of prosperity, its sense of rectitude, and when reached never found unjust, prejudiced, biased or partial, and rarely incorrect, standing and withstanding the severest tests. Added to this was a judgment sound, well defined, and trustworthy, and which when once formed was firm and immovable. He was a man of foresight and judgment profound. He was a safe counselor, sagacious, well-trained, and admirably versed in the principles of wise statesmanship and public policy; an instructive, judicious, and adhesive friend, unselfish, never withholding his views, but promptly and fully disclosing the same to his associates. His industry in search of truth was rarely equalled. He could not be unduly persuaded and was beyond seduction to do a wrong. With those capabilities, combined with honesty, fidelity, unswerving principles, and a high sense of honor, he ascended in unbroken triumph through all grades of life from the humblest walks to the exalted station of a Senator in its truest sense.

As a debater, he was sagacious, ponderous, and convincing; a man emphatically of argumentation. He had no superior and few equals when dealing with questions of fact; his powers of separation and condensation of facts and their application were wonderful. On questions of law, discriminating, clear, and forcible, with great capacity to present singleness of point. In debate his manner was courteous, becoming, earnest, attractive, and respectful, especially toward his adversary, with a marked toleration in respect to those differing with him in views or sentiments. There dwelt within that house of clay, not only a capacious mind, but also a heart open and frank, and one that knew no guile, no hate—one that ever vibrated to the touch of honor, sympathy, and justice. If upon any occasion he was informed or he felt that he had or may have unintentionally wronged his fellow, he was quick to offer or make amends; while on the other hand he was patient, forbearing, and forgiving if his fellow wronged him. Yet while this was true of him, if occasion demanded, he was resolute and manly in the maintenance of his rights and self-respect. As a representative he was faithful in the discharge of his duties. He applied the rule equally good in morals as in law, that the trustee, agent, or public servant should take and bestow the same care, do and cause to be done, to those whom he represented, as a prudent and discreet man did or should do with his own; and by this rule he squared all of his representative acts. And there can be no time or place in his long and useful representative life to be found, that he did not apply and enforce this rule of conduct. He fully recognized the important fact that this country and Government, under the Constitution, belonged to the people, and that this right should be respected and guarded, and that the will of his people should be done, and not his. So feeling, believing, and acting through life, he retained untarnished the warm affection of his people, not because and by the arts of demagoguery or by appeals to the prejudices and the baser passions of humanity, but by his masterly argumentation, the firmness and consistency of his convictions, and the devotion to the good of his country. Hence they honored him in life, and bless him and his memory and with us mourn his loss.

While he was ever watchful of the welfare of his State and the good of his people, he was nevertheless national in his views and feelings, greatly desiring the good of the whole country, but having grave doubts and serious forebodings as to its future which greatly annoyed him, for it was his great desire that the Government in essence should be transmitted as it had been received by him from his progenitors. And I can truthfully assert that if a love of country and civil liberty, with guarantees of life, liberty, and property, constitute the patriot, then Senator HOUSTON lived and died a patriot; that, if views and sentiments based upon the highest order of ability and thorough cultivation, that embraced the whole country and people, with the full recognition of equal rights, and without favor, distinction, or prejudice, makes the statesman, then Senator HOUSTON lived and died a statesman.

In his family he was courtly and tender as a husband, as a father affectionate and commanding; in bearing toward his fellow-citizens kind, affable, polite and respectful, approximating cordiality. For there was no station or place of preferment to which he had attained in which he failed to remember that he, too, was born of a woman, of few days, and alike subject to trouble and death.

In conclusion, Mr. President, borrowing an idea and somewhat of phraseology: There was a man that lived and died in the State of Alabama, and that man was upright, and one that feared God, and eschewed evil, and that man was the dead Senator, Hon. GEORGE S. HOUSTON, who died full of days, full of usefulness, and full of honors; whose life I shall try to emulate, and whose views I shall be pleased to see accomplished.

Mr. President, I ask for the adoption of the resolutions offered by my colleague.

The resolutions were agreed to unanimously.

Mr. PRYOR. As a further mark of respect to the memory of Mr. HOUSTON, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at two o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 26, 1880.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

NEW YORK CLEARING-HOUSE.

Mr. WARNER. I rise to a privileged question. On the 14th of January last the House adopted a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for information touching the connection of the United States Treasury with the New York clearing-house. I wish to inquire whether any response to that resolution has been received?

The SPEAKER. There has been, the Chair has been informed, no responses made to that resolution.

Mr. WARNER. I have to ask further what course is usually taken in such a case?

The SPEAKER. The remedy is with the House, not with the Chair. Mr. WARNER. I give notice, then, that on an early day I will call the resolution up again.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot call the resolution up again. It has probably gone to the Department. The gentleman might introduce a new resolution directing the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury to the former one. The failure to respond to it may be an oversight.

MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. WARNER, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 226) reaffirming the Monroe doctrine; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WARNER. I ask that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and also that it be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HASKELL. Is the resolution offered for reference?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. FRYE. May I ask to what committee it is proposed to refer this joint resolution?

The SPEAKER. To the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. FRYE. That subject is under consideration by the select committee on an interoceanic ship-canal.

The SPEAKER. The subject of the interoceanic canal has been referred to a select committee; but the subject of this joint resolution, aside from its connection with the canal question, properly goes to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. HASKELL. As an abstract proposition that is true, and under ordinary circumstances this joint resolution would properly be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Under an order of this House, however, all matters which may arise in connection with the subject of an interoceanic ship-canal have been referred to a select committee on that subject, and that committee has entered upon an elaborate investigation of the question.

Mr. WARNER. I have no objection to its reference to that committee.

The SPEAKER. Then the joint resolution will be printed, referred to the Select Committee on the Interoceanic Ship-Canal, and also printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution is as follows:

A joint resolution reaffirming the Monroe doctrine.

Whereas in his seventh annual message to Congress President Monroe asserted that "We owe it to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those [European] powers, to declare that we shall consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety;" and

Whereas the doctrine then announced has been accepted by the American people and has become a cardinal principle in our national policy; and

Whereas it is now proposed to construct, under guarantees to be given by foreign governments, a canal across the Isthmus of Darien: Therefore,

Be it resolved, &c., That the doctrine announced to the world more than half a century ago by President Monroe, and known as the Monroe doctrine, be, and the same is hereby, reasserted. And in accord therewith, in behalf of the people of the United States, we affirm that the control of any interoceanic canal across the Isthmus of Darien, while open to use by all nations equally, must, in the interest of ourselves and the world, be kept under the special protection of the United States.

Resolved, That the United States, sensible of the importance to the trade of the world of opening a water passage-way between the two oceans, will cordially promote, by such means as may be deemed proper and judicious, such an undertaking.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. REAGAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to ask permission at this time to report to the House three bills; one which has been adopted by the Committee on Commerce, one introduced by myself and referred to that committee, and one prepared by another member of the committee. The two bills prepared by individual members are to be offered as a substitute for the bill adopted by the Committee on Commerce. I ask that the three bills be printed, and that a day be set for their consideration.

There being no objection, the following bills were received, read a first and second time, and ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 4748) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce, and for other purposes;

A substitute entitled "A bill to regulate interstate commerce, and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers;" prepared by Mr. REAGAN; and

A substitute with the title "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communications among the several States,' approved June 15, 1866, and for other purposes;" prepared by Mr. McLANE.

Mr. REAGAN. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to ask unanimous consent that a day be set for the consideration of these bills, not to interfere with appropriation bills and other privileged bills. I will indicate the second Wednesday in March, after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. O'NEILL. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. REAGAN] if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON] is satisfied with that early day. I think it is very early.

Mr. REAGAN. I have indicated that day because there are other matters which are likely to come up before that time, and these bills will not be reached until those other matters are disposed of.

Mr. O'NEILL. Then I would suggest to the gentleman to fix a day two weeks from that time, for this is a very important subject, upon which members desire to prepare themselves before the House is called upon to consider it.

Mr. REAGAN. I have had in view what the gentleman suggests, but there are appropriation bills and other bills which have been fixed as special orders.

Mr. HOSTETLER. I must object; there are now several special orders.

Mr. REAGAN. It will not interfere with them.

Mr. HOSTETLER. If this is to interfere with the existing special orders—

The SPEAKER. It will be made a special order to come up in its chronological order.

Mr. O'NEILL. I will suggest the fourth Wednesday in March.

Mr. REAGAN. I will accept the suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is that these bills be made a special order for the fourth Wednesday in March after the morning hour, not to interfere with appropriation bills—

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. The funding bill has been made a special order.

The SPEAKER. It will not interfere with that; the funding bill is a prior special order.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I think the Chair has sometimes ruled that a subsequent special order, if a continuing order, would take precedence of other orders.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has always ruled that special orders come up in their chronological order. Of course the question of consideration can always be raised against a special order, and that question is within the power of the majority of the House.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I must object unless the funding bill is excepted.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Will the adoption of the new rules do away with the existing orders of the House?

The SPEAKER. That is a question which the House must determine, after the new rules are adopted, should they be adopted.

Mr. KENNA. Will the Chair state in reference to the special orders which have been fixed for different days?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the special orders will come up in the order of the dates for which they are fixed by the House; that is but equitable and right. Should the House not desire to consider a special order when the date fixed for it is reached, the remedy is with the majority. Any member can raise the question of consideration, and the majority can then determine whether the House will proceed to consider that special order or not.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether a special order, such as the gentleman from Texas now desires to have made, would come up notwithstanding a previous continuing order which would probably be continued until that particular time? In other words, would a prior continuing order take precedence of the special order now proposed to be made?

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands they would both be continuing orders.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Then, sir, I shall object.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman from New York will listen to me a moment he will see that there can be no difficulty about this matter. As I understand, a bill which has already been made a special order to continue from day to day would certainly, without further action of the House, have precedence of a bill now set for a subsequent day by a subsequent order.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. If I understand that the gentleman from Texas will not press his bill provided the funding bill is in order on that day, then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that all the special orders have the provision that they shall continue from day to day until disposed of, and they would come up in the order of the date of their assignment. When a special order is reached it is within the province of the House to make such disposition of the measure as it may please. The Chair hears no further objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HENDERSON. In connection with this subject I wish to say that I think there ought to be a larger number of these bills printed than usual.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, it will be ordered that twice the usual number be printed. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HOSTETLER. Before the arrangement suggested by the gentleman from Texas is made I desire to understand what it is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has just stated that special orders which have the characteristic of continuing from day to day will come up in the order in which the assignments for consideration are made. The Chair supposes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOSTETLER] desires to inquire as to the effect of this order with reference to a bill in which he is interested—a very proper and natural inquiry for him to make. The Chair, therefore, states that so far as he is advised the bill in which the gentleman from Indiana is interested is the first special order, and will naturally have the first place.

There being no further objection the order requested by the gentleman from Texas will be made.

Mr. REAGAN. I omitted to ask that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates no money.

The SPEAKER. Then it is not subject to a point of order?

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas further asks unanimously consent that the bill reported from his committee, with the two substitutes to be offered by members of the committee, shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. The Chair hears no objection, and the order is made accordingly.

MARKET AND SCHOOL IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HOUSE, by unanimous consent, (and by request,) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4749) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to dispose of the ground in square 446, in the city of Washington, belonging to said District, for market and school purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

ICE HARBORS, CHESTER AND MARCUS HOOK, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. WARD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4750) making an appropriation for enlarging the ice harbor at Marcus Hook, on the Delaware River, in the State of Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WARD also, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public service, to transmit to this House the report last received from the United States Corps of Engineers relative to ice harbors at Chester and Marcus Hook, on the river Delaware, in the State of Pennsylvania.

INVESTIGATION OF PENSION BUREAU.

Mr. GEDDES. The select committee appointed to investigate matters connected with the Pension Bureau have directed me to ask from the House authority to have printed for their use evidence taken by them and documents laid before them in connection with the investigation whenever the committee may deem such printing necessary.

There being no objection, the order requested by Mr. GEDDES was made.

PORTSMOUTH, OHIO, A PORT OF DELIVERY.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. The Committee on Commerce have unanimously instructed me to report with an amendment the bill (H. R. No. 559) to constitute the city of Portsmouth, in the State of Ohio, a port of delivery. A bill similar to this was passed in the Forty-fifth Congress, but was not reached in the Senate. I ask unanimous consent to report this bill for present consideration.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the bill be debated?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. No, sir.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the city of Portsmouth, in the State of Ohio, shall be, and is hereby, constituted a port of delivery within the collection district of New Orleans, and shall be subject to the same regulations and restrictions as other ports of delivery in the United States; and all the privileges and facilities afforded by the act of Congress of the 2d of March, A. D. 1831, entitled "An act allowing the duties on foreign merchandise imported into Pittsburgh, Wheeling, Cincinnati, Louisville, Saint Louis, Nashville, and Natchez to be secured and paid at those places," shall be extended to said port. A surveyor of customs shall be appointed to reside at said port and perform the duties prescribed by law, who shall receive such compensation now provided, or which may hereafter be provided, by law for surveyors of the same grade.

The amendment was read as follows:

At the end of the bill insert the following:

Provided, That the salary of the collector shall not exceed the net fees collected according to law at said port.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill and the amendment.

Mr. DUNNELL. Has the Secretary of the Treasury recommended the establishment of this port?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. He has.

Mr. DUNNELL. I should like to have that letter read.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Illinois. Were points of order reserved?

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent was asked for its consideration.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Illinois. Then it is still subject to points of order.

The SPEAKER. Of course; a gentleman could not know what the subject-matter was in reference to which unanimous consent was asked until the bill and amendment had been read. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Illinois. I make the point of order on the bill that it should have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I withdraw the report.

SALE OF PROPERTY IN NEW YORK.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask by unanimous consent to report from the Committee of Ways and Means a substitute for House bill No. 2263, to authorize the sale of certain property in the city of New York.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster-General to sell, on such terms as they may deem best, at public auction, on or before the 1st of June, 1880, in the city of New York, the land and premises formerly occupied as the site of the post-office in the city of New York, lying on Nassau street, between Cedar and Liberty streets, in the city of New York; provided, however, that they shall not sell the same for a less sum than $300,000, and that out of the proceeds of said sale they shall reimburse to the Chamber of Commerce in the city of New York the sum of $50,000, which its members, and others at their solicitation, contributed toward the purchase for the purpose of retaining the post-office in Nassau street.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I cannot consistently permit this bill to pass without objection, having objected to the one reported by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. TOWNSEND.] If I do not object to this I certainly must withdraw my objection to the other bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has nothing to do with that.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. As no one seems to care about these matters I will only object to this in case it is not withdrawn and the bill of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TOWNSEND] first permitted to pass.

Mr. GIBSON. This has been considered for the last two years by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I have only said that I could not, without being invidious, withhold the point of order on this bill, having made it to the one previously offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. TOWNSEND.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DIBRELL. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the morning hour.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his demand for the regular order of business.

Mr. DIBRELL. I withdraw it at the gentleman's request.

Mr. CABELL. I demand the regular order of business, and insist on it.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the morning hour.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the purpose of going into the Committee of the Whole to consider the star-route deficiency bill.

The SPEAKER. The motion to dispense with the morning hour requires a two-thirds vote.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 123, noes 8.

So (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the morning hour was dispensed with.

STAR-ROUTE DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, pending that, I move all general debate be limited to two hours. [Cries of "No!"] Then I will say one hour, as some gentlemen seem to complain two hours is too much and that one hour is sufficient.

Mr. PAGE. Let me appeal to the gentleman not to cut off debate to one hour. There have been three or four speeches already by the committee and only one in opposition to the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. In order that gentlemen may not complain, I will say two hours.

Mr. MILLS. Is that all to be given to the side of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. BLOUNT. No, sir.

Mr. MILLS. You had it all yesterday.

The question recurred on the motion to close general debate in committee in two hours.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 79, noes 64.

Mr. VALENTINE. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair orders tellers, and appoints Mr. VALENTINE and Mr. BLOUNT.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 95, noes 68. So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which general debate in committee was limited to two hours; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXCHANGE OF POSITIONS ON COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. At the request of Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina, and Mr. COWGILL, the latter is transferred from the Committee on Public Expenditures to the Committee on War Claims, and the former from the Committee on War Claims to the Committee on Public Expenditures.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the draught of a bill to amend section 20 of the act approved March 1, 1879, entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to internal revenue, and for other purposes," which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

MAIL SERVICE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting a list of all offers received for carrying the mails; report of all land or water mails established or ordered during the year ending June 30, 1879; a report of all allowances made to contractors during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and a report of curtailment in the mail service and pay of contractors during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department.

MAIL TRANSPORTATION ON STAR ROUTES.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SCALES in the chair, and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4736) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriations for the transportation of the mails on star routes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. SPRINGER. Before the gentleman proceeds I desire to know how the time allowed for this debate is to be divided?

Mr. PAGE. I am to have one hour.

Mr. SPRINGER. In opposition to the bill? I would like to ask the gentleman whether it is his purpose to oppose the bill for the reason that the amount appropriated is too little, or whether he opposes it entirely?

Mr. PAGE. I will give the gentleman all necessary information as I proceed.

Mr. SPRINGER. I only ask this for the reason that there are some gentlemen who are opposed to the bill generally and I want them to have an opportunity to be heard as well as those who oppose it simply because it does not supply the whole deficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. It would seem that a fair way would be to divide this time equally.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, because there are gentlemen opposing the bill because it does not appropriate enough to meet the whole wants of the Department, and some oppose it because they do not want to supply any of the deficiency existing at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that this is a matter that must be determined among the members of the committee themselves. The Chair has no control over the matter.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, during my seven years of service in this House I have seldom troubled the House with any remarks upon any subject. I have generally preferred to listen to others than to speak myself; but the provisions of this bill, in my judgment, are so dangerous to the interests of the people of that portion of the country which I in part represent that I feel impelled as a matter of duty to myself as well as to my constituents and to the people of the western country to raise my voice in opposition to the bill proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

This bill seeks to strike down one hundred and seven—I believe that is the number—of the principal star mail-routes in the West. It embraces, I believe, seven States and eight Territories. It embraces the States of Texas, California, Oregon, Nevada, Louisiana, Colorado, Nebraska, and Kansas, and the eight Territories of the United States. The bill, in my judgment, is subject to the point of order from the fact that it is new legislation, but I do not propose to make that point of order at the present time, though I shall do so when the bill is read and being considered by sections.

This bill, as I have already stated, strikes down absolutely one hundred and seven of the principal star routes through the Territories and a portion of the States, principally in the West. These one hundred and seven routes proposed to be stricken down by this bill include the great trunk routes of the postal service in those parts of the United States. While it provides that these great routes shall be stricken down and the service curtailed on them, it makes no provision for a similar reduction in reference to the short or side lines which supply and are supplied by these great trunk lines. For instance, it provides that on all of the long routes the service shall be reduced to once a week, for that was the original contract, while on the side routes, which, as I have stated, are supplied from these long routes, no reduction is made. They are to remain as they are, with service on them six times a week, and as a natural result they will have no mail to carry but that once a week. I listened attentively yesterday for some reason to be given by members of the Committee on Appropriations why this should be done, and I failed to hear one single reason why the whole service of the country should thus be disturbed. When Congress met in December last, the Post-Office Department notified us that there would be a deficiency of $1,700,000 in the star service, and asked Congress for an appropriation of $2,000,000 to meet this deficiency to enable this service to be continued in its present condition, as well as to provide for the necessary increase asked for up to the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. PAGE. Not to be taken out of my time.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope not. I ask unanimous consent, as this is my bill, that it shall not come out of the time of the gentleman from California.

Mr. PAGE. I cannot yield but a moment.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman misunderstands me. It is only in fairness to him I propose it.

The CHAIRMAN. The House having limited the time of general debate, the committee has no control over it even by unanimous consent.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman from Kentucky offered a resolution to investigate the administration of the Post-Office Department, so far as it related to the star service of the country; and the committee have had an opportunity to investigate for the last three months. Yet the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] made no statement on the floor of this House on yesterday during the discussion of this bill that led any member of this House to believe that there had been any fraud committed in the putting on of this extra service. If they thought there had been they should have so stated. For three months they have had an opportunity to bring in a report to this House and to point to any particular route on which the schedule has been expedited or the service increased through fraud.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I did not claim yesterday—and I expressly so stated in reply to the gentleman from Kansas—that there had been fraud. I charge fraud against no one. The gentleman therefore need not reach his point by implication.

Mr. PAGE. That is just what I stated. The gentleman has only repeated what I said. He did not charge fraud against any one. Consequently the gentleman admits that this service has been increased and the schedule time expedited in a legitimate manner under existing law. Is that what I understand the gentleman to say?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE. No sir; I have not time, for I have only an hour. But the gentleman from Illinois did appeal to the members of this House on yesterday, saying, this only affects one route in Kansas. He turned to the Kansas delegation and said, "It only affects one route in your State." He turned to the Texas delegation and said, "It only affects three routes in your State." He turned to the Louisiana delegation and said, "It only affects one or two routes in your State." And he appealed to the gentleman from Nebraska not to oppose this bill as it only affected one route in his State. And the States of Colorado, California, Oregon, Nevada, and the eight Territories of the United States are left alone to suffer, or to fight it out on the floor of this House as best they can.

That is an appeal, Mr. Chairman, which it seems to me comes with a bad grace from a member of the Appropriations Committee of this House. The Territories of the United States have the same rights to be considered on this floor by the members of that committee, and the great States of the West have the same rights before this House, as the constituency of the gentleman from Illinois. We are not legislating for California or Colorado or the other Pacific States and Territories; we are legislating for the American people, and endeavoring to give them a mail service such as is required, such as they have been having for the past twelve or eighteen months. This bill proposes to strike it down.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] says that this is an expensive service. Why, Mr. Chairman, this star service costs one-half per mile to-day than it did fifteen or twenty years ago. In 1860 the star service in this country west of the Mississippi River cost $107 per mile, with a schedule of two and one-half miles to the hour. The star service of to-day, with a schedule expedited, ranging from four and one-half to six miles per hour, costs only $54 per mile.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Will the gentleman yield to me to permit me to say a word?

Mr. PAGE. My time is limited and I must decline to be interrupted. Our friends in the East, more fortunate than ourselves, live in States that are a perfect network of railroads, where the mails pass and repass their doors two to four times a day, and they have three to five mails delivered a day. The railroad service of the country, composed of 1,171 routes and extending over a distance of 101,240 miles, costs the Government of the United States $17,178,100. The star service, composed of 9,225 routes, extending over 215,480 miles of service, costs the Government of the United States, if these two millions be added, $7,900,000. And yet the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] says he is opposed to the star service because it is extravagant. And he is opposed to the principle, and denounced it yesterday as vicious, of increasing the mail service of the country after the contracts had been made; and he wants to reduce all of them in our country down to their original condition.

Feeling a little curious, I called at the Post-Office Department to learn what was the condition of the star-route service in the different States; and I happened by accident—I believe it was accident—to stumble upon the sixth Georgia district; and I find that during the present contract term the service has been increased in the sixth Georgia district on nineteen different routes. I have a list of them here in my hand, and none of those routes will be affected by the bill as reported by the gentleman from Georgia on yesterday. Nineteen different routes have been increased there under the present contract system.

Mr. BLOUNT. But they are not up to your State by a great deal, even with the star service stricken down.

Mr. PAGE. I do not believe there are two routes upon which the service has been increased in my district, and my district will not be affected by this bill if it goes into operation. But let me say to the gentleman, if it be wrong to ask for increased service for the people of the West, if it be wrong for them to come before the Post-Office Department and ask that the mail service of the country be increased, how much more wrong is it for the gentleman from Georgia to have the service increased upon nineteen routes in one congressional district, and then to come in here and ask to have fourteen routes stricken down in the great State of California, sixteen in Colorado, and the balance of the one hundred and seven in other parts of the West?

Mr. BLOUNT. What do they cost?

Mr. PAGE. Will you deprive the people of this country of mail facilities because they will cost something?

Mr. BLOUNT. What do the nineteen routes cost that you refer to?

Mr. PAGE. I do not know. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] that the routes which he proposes by the provisions of this bill to strike down require four and six horse stage coaches to carry the mails, while upon the routes in the sixth congressional district of the State of Georgia, where the service has been increased—well, I ask the Clerk to read some extracts which I have marked in the Atlanta Constitution, and in that paper will be found some illustrations also showing the manner in which the mails have been carried in the district of my friend, on the routes which have had increased service.

Mr. BLOUNT. What is the date of that paper?

Mr. PAGE. January 25, 1880.

The Clerk read as follows:

The glory of the Government is the Monticello mail combination. I say combination, for it is composed of three parts, each dependent on the other and all necessary. First, there is Bosphorus, the mule, who has been in the business for years and knows the route better than any living man. Bosphorus is a curiosity; he is estimated to be thirty odd years of age, and his skin when he trots looks like a blanket spread over a man having a fit. But Bos, has genius. It is said that frequently last year when the carrier, who had then grown somewhat old and thick-headed, would fix his eye on Orion or Mars and pull the old mule around toward where he thought Monticello lay, slackened the reins, Bos, relying only on memory, would return to the proper road and jog along quietly home. Latterly it has been necessary to shove him out of Monticello, to land him safe in Macon, or vice versa.

The second and next important part of the combination is the conveyance, an antique two-wheel sulky that wobbles along with the mail-bag slung upon the axle. The sulky has a heartless and discouraged appearance and carcens frightfully. A friend of the carrier lately made a calculation to show that for every mile it traveled straight ahead the occupant traveled two sideways, and now they have framed a petition to increase his pay on the ground that his route has been trebled in length.

The third portion of the combination is the driver. It is a matter of surprise to some that the Government did not issue the commission to the mule, furnish him with a calendar and a list of legal holidays, and do away with the driver. I have been reliably informed, however, that a driver is absolutely indispensable. In the first place, the mule needs company. Just think of making a beast travel eighty miles a week with nobody to commune with—nobody to share his hopes and fears! Even a great and powerful Government would not thus impose upon a helpless beast. And then the mule needs a driver, and he needs assistance. There are hills along the route where the driver has to alight, shoulder the United States mail, and sulky cushion, and, having scraped the mud from the wheels, shove Bosphorus, sulky and all, over the crest. His assistance is also necessary on the down grade, for Bosphorus has but one way of going down hill; it is always a race for life, when that sulky begins to crowd him, and were not the driver aboard to throw out his block of wood and rope attached as a sort of drag anchor, the United States mail would run off with Bosphorus a dozen times a day. I trust, therefore, that the driver will not be dispensed with. There is such a thing as running even political economy in the ground.

[The reading of the above was frequently interrupted by laughter.]

Mr. PAGE. Of course, Mr. Chairman, I did not send that up to be read in order to cast any reflection on my friend from Georgia, for I have a very high regard for him personally.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not take the slightest offense; no apology is needed.

Mr. PAGE. Of the nineteen routes on which mail service has been increased in the sixth district of Georgia six routes run into Monticello. The receipts of the post-office at Monticello amount to $240 a year. I have here a map of Monticello, showing the routes upon which increased service has been put in the sixth congressional district of Georgia.

Now, I have no complaint to make of that. I want my friend from Georgia to have this increased service on these nineteen routes. But I want him to allow the people of the great West, the pioneers, the men who traveled thousands of miles across the continent to build up an empire, to have their mail facilities without molestation from the Committee on Appropriations of this House. [Applause.] If there has been any wrong committed, if any of this service has been expedited or increased not in accordance with law—

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman mean to say that the mail service has been increased on the nineteen routes in Georgia to which he refers?

Mr. PAGE. I do.

Mr. BLOUNT. Within the last two years?

Mr. PAGE. Yes.

Mr. BLOUNT. The service has not been increased on nineteen routes there on my recommendation.

Mr. PAGE. Now, I ask this House to stand by the people of the West and not break down this great service for a mere saving of a hundred or two hundred thousand dollars a year, for I am informed that that is all it will save. I ask the members of this House not to ruin the mail service on these one hundred and seven great routes when it will not cost $200,000 more to make the appropriation to carry on the service as now perfected than it will to pay the extra month's compensation for which the Government will receive nothing.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. PAGE. I will.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman where he gets that information?

Mr. PAGE. I got it from the Post-Office Department.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. From the Second Assistant Postmaster-General?

Mr. PAGE. I got it from the Post-Office Department this morning, from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. Here are his figures in his own handwriting.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Well, I have here his statement under oath showing that it will cost over a million.

Mr. PAGE. Let me read, and then there will not be so much discrepancy as the gentleman seems to think. On the one hundred and seven routes, which are the routes affected by this five-thousand-dollar limitation, the increased service amounts to $2,178,970. The contract price on those routes originally was $958,184; showing an increase of $1,219,786. One-fourth of that, for three months' service, is $302,446. Take one-third of that, which will be the amount of one month's extra pay, and it will be $101,648. Take that one month's extra pay from the cost of the service for one quarter of the year and it will leave $200,798. Now from that amount deduct the $100,000 which is provided for in this bill for increased service, and there will be left $100,798; which will represent the net saving under this bill.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Now then—

Mr. PAGE. I do not desire to be interrupted. The gentlemen on that side had three hours yesterday to discuss this bill and I cannot yield further.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. All right; the gentleman makes a misstatement and then will not yield for a correction.

Mr. PAGE. I do not make any misstatements.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have here the statement of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. PAGE. And I have read you from the figures which were made this morning by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Brady.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Does the Second Assistant Postmaster-General say—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. PAGE. I do not. The gentleman means one thing and I mean another; either he does not understand me, or else he does not understand the provisions of his own bill.

Now, it was asserted yesterday by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] that this is an expensive and extravagant service, and therefore ought to be cut down; and the Post-Office Department came in for a goodly share of his condemnation. Why, Mr. Chairman, I find by the books of the Post-Office Department that the Government supports an extra mail from New York to New Haven—the city I believe where the gentleman resides—at an expense of $25,000 for extra compensation in order that the people of New Haven may have the New York daily papers promptly every morning. Yet the gentleman from Connecticut is indignant when a bill is proposed which extends or perpetuates the service in the great West. He said yesterday (and I am sorry I do not see him now in his seat) that the Postmaster-General should have notified Congress at the extra session that there was to be a deficiency, or that there was a deficiency. Why, sir, does he not know—

Mr. WAIT. The gentleman will allow me to correct a statement he just made. My colleague [Mr. HAWLEY] does not reside in New Haven, but in Hartford.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Well, he lives in Connecticut at any rate.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Connecticut said yesterday that it was the duty of the Postmaster-General to have informed this House at the extra session that there was about to be a deficiency. He said that Congress was in session fifteen weeks, but no information came from that Department. Does he not know that the extra session of Congress adjourned on the 1st day of July, the very day on which the fiscal year began, and of course the Department could not then have anticipated this deficiency?

Mr. BLOUNT. The annual expense of the service as it then stood was $500,000 more than the amount appropriated for the next year.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman from Connecticut said that the Postmaster-General ought to be impeached because he had violated the law.

Mr. HAWLEY. I did not say that.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman said almost the same thing.

Mr. HAWLEY. A very different thing.

Mr. PAGE. I do not pretend to give the gentleman's exact language, because I have not seen the RECORD this morning. But the gentleman certainly said that this expenditure is in clear violation of law. What law? I will yield to the gentleman that he may tell me what sections of the Revised Statutes have been violated in this matter. I read from section 3679 of those statutes:

No Department of the Government shall expend, in any one fiscal year, any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations.

It is thus provided by law that no officer of this Government, no head of a Department, shall expend in any fiscal year a sum not already provided for by law. The Postmaster-General has not expended in excess of the appropriations made by law. He told you last December that he would not exceed the appropriations. He laid the matter before you and you have had three months in which to remedy the evil—to change the law if you desired to do so. But you have done nothing. You have investigated but never reported. Yet you say that there has been a violation of law. He has notified you that the reason there must be a reduction of this service is in order that there may be no violation of law—that no money shall be expended in excess of the appropriation. But the gentleman asks why the Postmaster-General did not notify this House. I call the gentleman's attention to a portion of the report submitted by the Postmaster-General when Congress convened last December. In referring to the star service, he says:

The operation of the present laws regulating the increase of compensation for increased speed and increased frequency of service upon star routes results in great loss to the Government. These laws (sections 3960 and 3961 of the Revised Statutes) have been in force for many years, and are the source of nearly all the deficiencies in the appropriations for star service which have ever been created. They are as follows:

"SEC. 3960. Compensation for additional service in carrying the mail shall not be in excess of the exact proportion which the original compensation bears to the original service; and when any such additional service is ordered, the sum to be allowed therefor shall be expressed in the order, and entered upon the books of the Department; and no compensation shall be paid for any additional regular service rendered before the issuing of such order.

"SEC. 3961. No extra allowance shall be made for any increase of expedition in carrying the mail unless thereby the employment of additional stock and carriers is made necessary, and in such case the additional compensation shall bear no greater proportion to the additional stock and carriers necessarily employed than the compensation in the original contract bears to the stock and carriers necessarily employed in its execution."

It frequently happens, especially in the mining regions of the West, that, at the time of advertising, service is not required upon new routes more frequently than once or twice a week; but after the contracts have been made and service begun, population increases along the line, and an increase of speed and more frequent service become necessary. Under such circumstances it is clear that the rate that was reasonable for service once or twice a week, through a sparsely settled region, becomes exorbitant when multiplied by three or six to cover daily service. I would therefore recommend that section 3960 be so amended as to permit the Postmaster-General to advertise for new proposals for the increased service, the contract to be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder, as usual. Section 3961 should be so amended that when the cost of increased speed would amount to more than 50 per cent. of the cost of the original service the Postmaster-General should readvertise for service at the increased speed.

Thus it will be seen that the Postmaster-General three months ago submitted his report calling attention to this very defect in the law of which the gentleman complains. Has any bill been presented or advocated by any member of the Committee on Appropriations or by any gentleman on this floor to change the existing law so as to take this matter away from the discretion of the Postmaster-General? Not at all. He is the only proper officer to exercise this discretion, and gentlemen of the committee know it full well. When this House attempts to legislate as to the particular routes on which certain service shall be performed it goes beyond what I conceive to be the duty of legislators. It undertakes to take away a necessary and proper discretion from the administrative department of this Government, from officers who are supposed to have all the facts before them and who can decide whether service is required upon those routes or not.

I say to gentlemen of the Appropriations Committee that they cannot find a single route on which the service has been expedited or increased except upon the advice of Senators and members of Congress; and if there has been fraud committed they are accessory before the fact. I repeat—for I want to enforce the fact on the House—that there is not a mail-route which this bill proposes to strike down on which the service was not increased or expedited upon the recommendation in person or by letter of honorable Senators and members of Congress.

And I myself have frequently recommended it, and I intend to do it again. To-day I have at least fifty letters awaiting the action of this House, asking for increase of mail facilities throughout different portions of the country, particularly California and in the district represented by my honorable colleague [Mr. BERRY] across the way.

Mr. Chairman, the people of California and Nevada during the war kept up at their own expense almost exclusively a service known as the pony express, which ran from some point on the Missouri River to Placerville and Sacramento in California. The price they paid for every letter of a half ounce weight was $5, and when the news of an important battle was carried to California it was carried by means of the pony express at an expense to these people whom we now propose to deprive of all mail service. Fourteen routes in my own State are to be ruthlessly cut down, and people who were patriotic enough to contribute of their means to support the pony express for months and years which carried the news from the Potomac to far distant California and Nevada, are to be punished as it were by withholding from them the mail facilities which they have heretofore enjoyed. Yet I say this committee thinks the people do not appreciate mail service in the West, although there must be extra trains at the expense of $25,000 to bring the morning papers to my friend from Connecticut, who wants to impeach the Post-Office Department bodily for having obeyed the laws.

Mr. HAWLEY. Has the gentleman any objection to my making a correction?

Mr. PAGE. Certainly not.

Mr. HAWLEY. Only a moment. In the first place, I never knew how much was given that railroad for any of these contracts; never had anything to do with them at all, in any way or shape, for getting the New York Herald any earlier than they used to. And it is against my interest, because I publish a morning paper there. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAGE. They evidently did not want to read the gentleman's paper, and did want to read the New York papers. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. The object of the increased mail facility was that the gentleman's paper might get to New York earlier. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAGE. I do remember that my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and my other distinguished friend from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] were very loud at the extra session in declaiming against riders on appropriation bills. They said it was an outrage. And they staid here for three months to prevent on appropriation bills legislation which cut down and deprived the people in this country of that protection given to them by the election laws. They said it was an outrage; but when an attempt is made to cut off one hundred and seven mail-routes, and deprive men of seven States and eight Territories of mails they are entitled to under the laws, it is not an outrage, and my friend from Illinois and my friend from Connecticut say it must be done.

They say it is all right, and must be done on this bill. I say that any man who stood on the floor of this House on this side, and contended for a principle that protects an American citizen in the right to vote, that was intended to perpetuate a republican form of government; I say any man that stood by that principle cannot now refuse to stand by the people in the West when they say the striking down of their mail facilities is more injurious to them than depriving them of a few extra marshals at the election. And, sir, there is no more reason why you should do one than the other. Any republican on the floor of this House who votes with those gentlemen will stultify himself before his constituents and the people of the country. The right of the people to get their letters and papers once, or twice, or three times a week, as they have been getting them, is as precious to them and the principle involved is as sacred as the appointing of marshals at elections.

If I had been present at the extra session of this Congress I would have been with this side of the House, as I believe they were right; and they will be right now in standing by me to prevent obnoxious legislation being placed on this appropriation bill. For is not this legislation? The voices of the gentlemen from Illinois and Connecticut have been heard in this Hall not later than a week ago declaiming loudly against riders upon appropriation bills. They said it was wrong, and any party would be doing wrong which perpetuated a rule allowing legislation upon appropriation bills. But I find the republicans on that committee, some of them, coming in here advocating the very principle which one week ago they denounced. It is here provided that the Postmaster-General shall not expedite or increase service on a single postal route where the contract price might exceed $5,000. It is an important change in existing law, fraught with more mischief to the people of the western country than any other legislation which can possibly be proposed during this session of Congress. If you were sincere when you protested against the principle contained in the present rules which permits legislation upon appropriation bills; if you were sincere when you protested for three months against the attempt of the majority of the House to deprive the country of that protection given to them by the laws; if you were, I say, sincere, then you will now cast your votes against the pending measure. I believe I can safely appeal to the members of this House, both on the democratic and republican sides, to defeat this bill.

I can say, however, if this thing has to be done let it be done by the party of the majority in this House. But I do not believe they can do it. I do not believe the majority party in this House wants to assume the responsibility of cutting off one hundred and seven mail routes in this country and depriving the people of the increased facilities which for the past twelve or eighteen months, as the case may be, they have enjoyed. I do not believe that side of the House will do it, and I think that I may consistently appeal to members on both sides of the House to stand by California and Oregon, and to stand by the Territories who have no vote here.

Why, it was stated yesterday as an argument by some of the gentlemen that some of these States had but little interest in this question, and they were asked not to vote against this bill because "you have only one route; let California and the Territories fight it out." Mr. Chairman, that is not legislation. That is not statesmanship. That is not what the American people want. They want all the people of all the States to enjoy equal benefits to be conferred by the Government. They do not want the mail facilities of the country curtailed. We do not want them curtailed. If any change is made, the feeling of the country and the interests of the people and the demands of business require its extension rather than its curtailment.

Let me say in conclusion that if any member of this committee will point out a single route which has been corruptly increased or expedited I will vote with him or with any member of that committee to cut off that service thus obtained, and vote as well to censure any person holding a public position in this country who has willfully violated the laws of the land. I now yield five minutes of my time to my colleague [Mr. BERRY] if he desires to use it.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Chairman, I have nothing particular to offer upon this pending measure. I wish simply to point out that so far as California is concerned, and especially the third congressional district, which I have the honor to represent, that if this bill passes, the mail facilities are virtually destroyed in that district. But, sir, I am in this condition, if there is no bill passed the mail facilities are also ruined. That is to say, they are ruined if the order that has been issued by the Post-Office Department is to go into effect. If that order is executed, nine-tenths of my people are without mail facilities except once a week.

Sir, the great line that connects the States of California and Oregon—the California and Oregon line terminating at Redding and the Oregon and California line which terminates at Roseburg in Oregon—upon this great route which connects the two States we now have a daily mail, and I am informed that not less than two thousand pounds of mail matter per day pass over that line, which service will be reduced to one trip a week if this order of the Department shall be carried into execution. Is this House ready to sever the connection between these two great States of the Pacific? Are we to be left on that coast without knowing what the other States and people are doing? And in addition to this let me say that I find out of the fourteen routes in California which will be affected by the passage of this bill or, further, by the failure of any appropriations being made if the order of the Post-Office Department should go into effect, that eight out of these fourteen routes are in my own congressional district; and when you take these eight lines, the important lines in my district, and reduce them from a daily to a weekly service, that people will feel they are virtually severed from the Government, because in those rural districts the people naturally feel it is to the postal arm of the Government they are most indebted. It is the arm of the Government that they appreciate most and upon which they are most dependent, and should that be stricken down, that service upon which they now rely, those people will feel that the Congress of the United States has done them and their affairs an irreparable injury.

Now, there has been much complaint made against the Post-Office Department. I am not prepared to accuse that Department of any wrong in this connection. I want to say further, before closing, that I have no accusation to make against the Post-Office Department. It may have been guilty of abuses in putting on improper service in some localities, or in paying exorbitant prices for service, but increasing the service from a weekly to a daily mail in my district was a necessity, and should have been done. As to the price paid by the Department, as has been stated here, it may have been exorbitant, but of that I am not prepared to judge. But do not deprive the people of the mail facilities which the Post-Office Department has already given them because this Department may have given to some favored contractor a large amount of money for a small quantity of work. Let the appropriation be made to supply all the needed facilities, and then investigate, and if the Department has been guilty of any wrong I am ready and the people of my district will sanction the most extreme measures being inflicted upon the violator of the law. All I ask is that you do not deprive the people of the facilities which they now enjoy.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PAGE. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HAWK.]

Mr. HAWK. Mr. Chairman, believing as I do that the provisions of this bill do not represent the sentiment of the people of this country upon this important question, I desire to offer a few thoughts briefly as I can that have presented themselves to my mind upon this subject. And in order that we may be made acquainted with the provisions of the law upon which the action of the Department is based, I quote the following sections of the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 3971. The Postmaster-General may enter into contracts for extending the line of posts to supply mails to post-offices not on any established route, and, as a compensation for carrying the mail under such contracts, may allow not exceeding two-thirds of the salary paid to the postmaster at such special offices.

SEC. 3965. The Postmaster-General shall provide for carrying the mail on all post-roads established by law, as often as he, having due regard to productiveness and other circumstances, may think proper.

It will be seen, Mr. Chairman, that these sections of the statute give the Postmaster-General the most untrammelled discretion in not only establishing service on routes where there have been no mails, but he shall provide for carrying the mails on all post-roads established by law as often as he may think advisable, having due regard to productiveness, &c.

These are certainly unlimited powers in their special directions, and it was evidently intended by the framers of the law to give this power into the hands of the Postmaster-General, in order that the rapid development of portions of the country might be met and supplied with this needed requirement, not to say absolute demand, of advancing civilization.

This discretionary power has been used, and that, too, under the pressure of various interests calling loudly upon the Department for recognition and consideration. It is useless now to consider this peculiar condition in which we find this important Department of our Government in any other than a business sense.

I have listened with great interest to the progress of this debate, and find no reason for supposing there has been any fraud practiced by the Department in wielding this great power. No gentleman in the progress of this discussion has had the temerity to charge bad faith upon the Department; and in the absence of such charge it appears there is one of three questions which we are called upon to decide.

First. Has this power been exercised improperly and without due regard to economy, having in view the interests of the body of the people as well as that of economic administration of the Department?

Second. Can the service be reduced upon these star routes, so called, without detriment to the people whose fortune it may be to be supplied by these lines?

Third. If such reduction can be made, how and where shall it be done?

It appears that the Department, acting upon the best information obtainable, and upon the urgent pressure of various parties in interest, including many Senators and Representatives in Congress, has been, is now, of the opinion that on these routes it has been absolutely necessary to exercise this power to what appears at first view to be an unwarranted extent.

It is submitted, however, that when population has increased to the extent it has in many cases in our Western Territories that the requirements are such as to make it exceedingly difficult to avoid this extraordinary addition to the service. It is almost utterly impossible to ignore the crying needs of new communities in this respect. Our business transactions have been conducted with such rapidity during the years since our great war that the people feel they are justly entitled to have all the appliances necessary to the rapid, unchecked transaction of their various business interests. To this clamor the Department has yielded at various points all over the country, and the aggregation of the exercise of this discretionary power has resulted in a startling present and prospective deficiency of $1,700,000 in round numbers. The question is, shall this remarkable increase of expenditures be checked; if so, how shall it be done?

The bill under consideration attempts to correct this so-called abuse by loading down a small portion of the routes numerically, or rather circumscribing their scope by fixing an arbitrary amount, beyond which if any given route shall be found to have been increased, the same shall be peremptorily decreased to the terms of the original contract. This is an arbitrary action, extremely restrictive, and it is not difficult to understand that great injustice may be done the service, and great suffering to the business interests along said lines be the result.

I have failed to hear a proper reason given for this sweeping arbitrary action. Much valuable information has been given to the House and country by gentlemen who have preceded me; but no good and sufficient reason has as yet been presented by any of the distinguished gentlemen for the enactment of this bill into law. My judgment would be, Mr. Chairman, that some restrictive measure should be adopted from year to year upon this point, as well for the benefit of the people as for the protection of the Department from the persistent importunities of those specially interested.

Our star-route system is so useful in its various functions that we cannot afford to cripple it. Its uses in the protection and development of our frontier and as a precursor of civilization in our new western empire are such that no true statesman can afford to stand as its destroyer, or even as one thrusting obstructions in the way of its legitimate and proper advancement.

I feel that, while I am willing to prorate the reduction upon these routes and throw about the system any bulwark for its careful protection against the rapacity of contractors who systematically calculate upon plundering, the provisions of this bill are entirely too restrictive and unjust in their discriminations against these main trunk lines of our star-route system—one hundred and seven in number, I believe—sought to be restricted.

Seeing as I do the grand possibilities in the near future in store for our postal system, I desire by my voice and vote to guard, protect, defend it to the last against rapacity and importunity; but far be it from me to trammel, smother, or strike it down from its proud position.

Mr. PAGE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado, [Mr. BELFORD.]

Mr. BELFORD. We listened yesterday for four hours to the members of the Appropriations Committee in their advocacy of the passage of this bill. This bill affects every Territory and State in the West, and yet this morning the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] who has the bill in charge, made a motion that the debate be limited to two hours, thus depriving the Delegates from the Territories and the Representatives from the Western States of the opportunity of exposing the injurious effects that will be entailed upon their section by the passing of this act; and of those two hours the representatives of the Territories of Washington, Idaho, Montana, and Wyoming, and the States of California, Colorado, Nevada, and Oregon are allowed to enjoy one. We are sent here to represent the interests of our people; and yet this Committee on Appropriations, which has constituted itself into the very tyrant of this House, has issued its edict declaring that we shall be deprived of the opportunity of presenting our grievances and of acquainting this House with the facts which justify our opposition to this bill.

During the last year, in the State of Colorado fifty additional post-offices were created. They were called into existence by the necessities of the people. Towns were multiplying, mining-camps were starting up in the north and in the south and in the middle portion of my State, making an increase in post-offices and post-routes necessary. And as an illustration of the remarkable growth of the postal service, I desire now to call the attention of the House to the receipts of this Government from the post-office in the city of Denver during the last three years. In 1877 the receipts at the post-office in Denver amounted to $62,000; in 1878, to $70,000; in 1879 they amounted to over $150,000. The receipts from the money-order division in 1877 amounted to $530,000; in 1878, to $751,000; in 1879, to $1,459,000. The receipts from the city of Denver are equal to those from the State of West Virginia. They exceed the receipts from the State of Florida by $50,000. They are equal to one-half the receipts from the entire State of Georgia.

What is true of the city of Denver is equally true of the city of Leadville. The post-office in the city of Leadville was established in the month of July, 1877. It was located on a tri-weekly route. It yielded to this Government the last year $43,000. The receipts from the two cities of Denver and Leadville are greater than the receipts from the State represented by the gentleman who reported this bill. And yet, under the operation of this infamous bill, it is proposed to reduce the service at Leadville from a daily to a weekly mail. I ask the gentlemen of this House, are they willing to inflict such an injury upon that young and growing city of the West?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KEIFER. I hope the gentleman will be allowed five minutes more.

Mr. BELFORD. I thought I had ten minutes altogether.

Mr. PAGE. I feel it my duty, as the gentleman represents a State very much affected by this bill, to yield to him the balance of my time with the exception of two minutes. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. BELFORD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the Post-Office Department has been extravagant in the expenditure of this money or not. But I do know that the people of the Western States and Territories are just as much entitled to receive their mail promptly as are the people of the Eastern States. They are the men who went there and enlarged the trail of the pioneer into the pathway of western empire. They are an intelligent, enterprising class of people, and their business interest as largely depends upon the receipt of their mails as does the business interest of any community in the eastern part of our country.

I desire to call the attention of this House to the fact that during the past nine years we have been steadily increasing the miles of annual transportation in the West; and every route to be affected by this bill is a route located in western States or Territories. In Colorado this bill affects fifteen different routes. Does the House intend to declare to the miners of the West at Silver Cliff, at Rosita, at Rico, at Leadville, "we will deprive you of your mail facilities simply because they call for an expenditure of a large amount of money?" Who ever before in this country asserted that the mail service should be a self-supporting service? No man has ever announced that proposition before. Every member of this House knows that from 1866 down to 1879 the expenditures of the Post-Office Department largely exceeded its receipts; and yet no man at any time or any place has affirmed that the mail facilities of the people for that reason should be diminished.

In 1870 the miles of annual transportation by the star routes amounted to 43,350,641, and cost $5,049,598. In 1879 we had increased the miles of annual transportation to 69,248,339, and the amount of money paid for it from $5,049,000 to $6,411,000. In 1870 the cost of mail transportation averaged eleven cents per mile; in 1879 it averaged but nine cents per mile. In nine years we increased the miles of annual transportation twenty-four millions and increased the amount of the cost $1,452,000.

I represent, Mr. Chairman, on this floor a State that has never received one dollar of appropriation of any kind from the General Government, with the exception of $5,000 for a military road. And I ask the members of this House, not to grant us an appropriation, not to take money out of the public Treasury to improve rivers or to dredge harbors, but I do ask you to vote us enough of money to keep unimpaired and in its full efficiency the mail service of the State of Colorado.

I have been informed by one of the best railroad men in this country that during the next twelve months the population of Colorado will be increased over one hundred thousand. I know that new towns will start up and that they will need this service.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PAGE. The two minutes which I have remaining I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

Mr. WRIGHT. In the short time allowed me I desire to say to the House a few words. I do not think we should regard this as a question of dollars and cents. We have in the western portion of the country a vast region which is becoming populated, and I maintain that it is the duty of Congress to furnish the people of that region the usual mail facilities. As I have already said, it is not simply a question of dollars and cents.

I have not heard here the charge made that there have been any illegal practices on the part of the Post-Office Department. The only subject of complaint in this debate, so far as I have heard, is that in order to accommodate the people of the great western region of our country there must necessarily be expended a large sum of money. Now, I am willing to vote any amount of money necessary to supply those people with usual mail facilities.

We in the eastern part of the United States, in all the principal cities, are supplied with the mails four or five times a day. We have been informed in the debates here that in the great portion of the western country the people are supplied with only a weekly mail, and in some few instances only with a daily mail. If in the Middle States our mail service was cut down to that point we would regard it as an outrage upon our civil and political rights.

I have therefore come to the conclusion that the people of the West ought to have the money they want in order to give them their necessary mail facilities. I stand here as a member of the House of Representatives to vote all the money that is necessary for the transportation of the mails through the western country. There should be no objection made to that. The Post-Office Department has never been self-sustaining; it has always been a tax upon the people.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CLYMER. I had designed, Mr. Chairman, to occupy the hour which under the rules would have been accorded to me as a member of the Committee on Appropriations; but the time for debate having been shortened by the action of the House, I cannot do so without depriving other gentlemen deeply interested in and well acquainted with this subject of an opportunity to express their views upon it. Therefore I will take the floor at this time and yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BAKER.]

Mr. MAGINNIS. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAGINNIS. According to the usual practice of the House, ought not the time to be consumed in this debate to be divided equally between the members of the Committee on Appropriations and the other members of the House who are opposed to this bill? On yesterday three members of the Committee on Appropriations occupied an hour each.

The CHAIRMAN. That is no point of order.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I do not desire to interfere with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] is entitled to the floor for fifteen minutes.

Mr. BAKER. Under instructions from the Committee on Appropriations I now send to the Clerk's desk to be read a substitute for the entire bill reported on yesterday.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the sum of $970,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to meet the expenses of inland mail transportation on star routes for the remainder of the current fiscal year, at or within the contract prices as they existed on February 1, 1880: Provided, That upon any route where there has been an increase of the original contract price during the last or the current fiscal year for expediting the delivery of mails on any such route at the rate of more than $2,500 per annum, the compensation for expediting service on such routes shall be reduced to the terms of the original contract on and after the 1st day of March, 1880; and nothing herein contained shall be construed to require the reduction of the number of trips per week over any such route below the present number. During the remainder of the current fiscal year no further expediting of service on any postal star route shall be made.

Sec. 2. That the further sum of $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated as aforesaid to enable the Postmaster-General to place new service as authorized by law.

Mr. BAKER. During the brief time allowed me for the discussion of this subject I shall try to confine my remarks exclusively to the business aspects of the question. Whenever there shall be a question presented to the House touching the impeachment of any person connected with the administration of the Post-Office Department I shall then deem it sufficient time to indulge in bitter criminations against that Department. I shall consider now simply the facts as they are patent to the country, without expressing any opinion in reference to the responsibility of any person connected with the Post-Office Department for the condition of things that now exists.

It is apparent, by the reports which have been presented to the House and to the country, that in order to carry on the service of transporting the mails on star routes for the residue of the fiscal year, at the present rate of compensation, it will require $1,700,000 additional appropriation. To meet this acknowledged condition of things there are several methods in which the House can pass upon this question.

The first is, to accede to the demand made by the Department, and which is insisted on by certain members of this House, that this Committee of the Whole shall pass, without scrutiny and without expressing any opinion upon its necessity, a deficiency appropriation bill for the full amount required to continue the service on its present basis.

Another method of meeting this condition of affairs would be by passing a moderate appropriation of say $500,000, and allowing the service to run as it is now until an investigation should be had, in order to determine exactly what new legislation should be enacted in order to hold the Department within the limits of the appropriation made from year to year.

Another method would be by passing the appropriation bill recommended to us yesterday; a bill which the committee knows I did not approve, for the reason that if it was true as charged here (a matter about which I propose to express no opinion) that there has been extravagance at least in the administration of this service, that bill proposed to allow all extravagance where the expedition did not exceed in cost the annual sum of $5,000 to remain just as it was, while where the expedition had occasioned an annual outlay of $10,000, $15,000, $20,000, and in one instance as high as $165,000, it proposed to cut the increase down to the arbitrary sum of $5,000. That bill seemed to me illogical and indefensible on any theory on which I could view it, and consequently I felt constrained to favor another proposition which while it would reduce the amount of deficiency asked for would at the same time, it seemed to me, enable us to apply some reasonable rule to this whole question.

The increase which has been made is of two classes. One is for additional service—that is, additional trips. The other is for expediting the service. The statute provides that where an additional number of trips are allowed by order of the Department the contractor shall receive for the increased number of trips an additional compensation precisely proportioned to the amount he received for the trips originally contracted for. That leaves but little chance for fraud. If the contractor has received $1,000 for weekly trips, and the service is increased to daily trips, he gets $7,000. It is a mere matter of arithmetic. But where the increase is for expediting the service the rate of increased compensation is entirely arbitrary. Let me illustrate. On the route from Fort Yuma to Fort Worth, a distance of fourteen hundred and twenty-six miles, the original bid of the contractor was $134,000. He was required to make daily trips. Each trip, beginning daily, was to be carried through in seventeen days. The service was expedited. The trips being still daily, the contractor was required to run each trip through in thirteen days. Thus he is allowed $165,000 additional compensation for carrying the mail the same number of trips, but making each trip thirteen days instead of seventeen. In other words, the schedule is increased from three and a half miles an hour to four and a half miles an hour. It is stated that for the original contract he would require ninety-two carriers and three hundred and seventy-eight animals; for the increased service he would require one hundred and eighty carriers and nine hundred and eighty-six animals. That is to say, he claims to be allowed, and he is allowed, for one team of four horses at stations six and one-half miles apart; and those teams are only required to make a trip six and a half miles one way and six and a half miles back, occupying during the twenty-four hours only about two hours and forty minutes. Now, there is no man within the hearing of my voice who will claim that that is not wrong. It ought not to be allowed.

The bill now pending as a substitute gives to every State and every Territory and every post-office the same number of mail deliveries that it has now. If your mails have been increased from a weekly to a daily delivery, that will be continued. In addition to this, upon routes where $2,500 or less has been allowed for expedition, that expedited service will be retained. I take it that the interests of the people of this country are involved in the question of the number of mails that they have. The question whether a mail shall be carried from Fort Worth to Fort Yuma a few hours earlier or a few hours later, is not very important; but it may be important, it is important, whether it is carried once a week or seven times a week. We do not propose to interfere with the number of deliveries that you now have; we allow you to have the delivery of mails just as often as you have it under the present condition of things. It is true that a little longer time may be required in the delivery of the mail, amounting, if the route is long, to a day or two, perhaps; if the route is short, to a few hours. But this I submit is no great inconvenience, no great injury.

Mr. CALKINS. I wish to ask my colleague a question as to the effect of the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BAKER. I hope my colleague will be very brief, for my time is short.

Mr. CALKINS. I will be very brief. I want my colleague to explain to the Committee of the Whole the effect of this provision of the amendment which is offered on behalf of the committee:

Provided, That upon any route where there has been an increase of the original contract price during the last or the current fiscal year for expediting the delivery of mails on any such route at a rate of more than $2,500 per annum, the compensation for expedited service on such routes shall be reduced to the terms of the original contract on and after the 1st day of March, 1880.

Now, under this provision, will the service on routes where there has been an increase for expedited service not exceeding $2,500 remain as it is, and where the increase has been beyond $2,500, will the service be cut off? Is that the effect of the amendment?

Mr. BAKER. The effect of that proposition, as I understand, will be this: wherever the increase for expedition has been $2,500 or less the service will not be affected by it.

Mr. CALKINS. That is what I understand. Now let me ask the gentleman a question. Why is it wrong to stand by the schedule where the increase amounts to more than $2,500, and right to stand by it where it does not exceed that sum?

Mr. BAKER. I will tell the gentleman why. Where the amount is $2,500 or less there is very little room for extravagance or fraud. I desire to show why we have put the limit at $2,500. Take the route from Vinita to Las Vegas—from the Indian Territory to New Mexico. The original contract gave one service per week at the rate of $6,330. It was increased to seven trips weekly, which would make the cost $44,310. But the rate of speed has been increased about a mile an hour upon this route, some eight hundred miles long, giving a delivery over the whole route perhaps twenty-four hours earlier, and in this way the expense has been increased by the enormous sum of $106,000.

I hold twelve routes in my hand, upon which there has been for additional service, additional trips, an increase of $178,000. What for? Additional expedition.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not understand my colleague—

Mr. BAKER. I cannot yield. The reason is where the increase is $2,500 a year there will be no inducement to form large combinations for frauds and raids upon the Treasury, but when it amounts to hundreds of thousands of dollars the combinations are too strong to be resisted, and that is where there is fraud, if any.

Mr. CALKINS rose.

Mr. BAKER. The gentleman will excuse me. I will say so far as I am personally concerned I should prefer if this cut off all increased expedition. I think if we give these people in the Territories and new States a daily mail, if we give them the rates of speed for its delivery they had six and twelve months ago, the country is doing remarkably well, especially until this question can be investigated and thoroughly understood.

I am laboring under such a severe cold and indisposition that I do not feel disposed to trespass upon the time of the committee, and therefore will yield the floor.

Mr. CLYMER. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I shall yield to no man on this floor in my desire to advocate any bill and all measures which will give mail facilities to the Western States and to the Pacific States. And I shall not in what I have to say here attack the Post-Office Department; certainly not attack it upon any evidence presented to me or charge that it has been guilty of fraud. But I desire to say to the gentleman from California, and to all gentlemen who have taken the ground that the Post-Office Department has not violated law, that they have misconceived the spirit of the statute; they not only misconceive the spirit of the statute, but the letter of the statute also.

Take the two sections of the Revised Statutes under which all this increase of contracts has been made, and for a moment I ask the attention of the committee to them:

SEC. 3679. No Department of the Government shall expend, in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, nor involve the Government in any contract.

Does the gentleman from California tell me that when the Post-Office Department exceeds the appropriation, signs a contract far in excess of the appropriation, simply reserving the power to itself to be relieved of that contract by forfeiture of a penalty, that it does not involve the Government in excess of appropriations made by Congress? Will any lawyer on this floor tell me when a contract has been entered into which may exceed the appropriation and go beyond the amount of the appropriation a million or a hundred thousand dollars, that because there is reserved in the contract the power of the Government to forfeit on the contract on the payment of a penalty provided Congress does not make further appropriation, that that Department has not involved the Government in a contract against the spirit and letter of the provision of law I have quoted? This is the square legal proposition which is presented on that section of the statute.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman from New York admits that the Post-Office Department has declared to the House that they do not intend to exceed the money appropriated by Congress.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand—

Mr. PAGE. But wait a moment. Does he not understand that the amount will be cut down under the declaration of the Post-Office Department, to come within the appropriation made by Congress?

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand precisely this, that since July 1st last, up to the present time, on one branch of the service, the Department has made contracts which create a deficiency of $325,000. They have made contracts with the Treasury empty, and the Government can only be relieved by paying a penalty to be absolved from those contracts. I say again to the gentleman from California, the Department when it made those contracts involved the Government beyond the appropriation.

But let me go one step further on this proposition:

SEC. 3732. No contract or purchase on behalf of the United States Government shall be made unless the same is authorized by law or under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment.

Here, then, these contracts are made in excess of the appropriation, confessedly in excess of the appropriation. No law warrants them, and yet gentlemen say the Post-Office Department has not violated the spirit or the letter of these two provisions. I maintain both the letter and spirit of these two provisions of the statute have been violated.

Then, sir, the question presented to this committee is this: whether a Department of this Government, sending here to the House its estimates for the appropriations, having those appropriations voted to the fullest extent, can go on in defiance of law, after the full amount appropriated has been expended, and create a deficiency by unlawful contracts, and then come and demand that while they have violated the law, while they have gone contrary to the provisions of the statute upon the request of individuals, upon the request of members of Congress, who perchance did not get the appropriation they asked voted, Congress shall ratify these unauthorized contracts by deficiency appropriations.

One word further, Mr. Chairman, in reference to this subject, and I shall yield the balance of my time. Gentlemen have stood here for a long time—and they claim that they have not had time enough, however—and have assailed the Appropriations Committee, and they have assailed every one upon this floor that has criticised—I say criticised—the Department or has said one single word against ratifying unlawful contracts by voting to this Department of the Government all that it asked. Has the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] or my friend from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] one single word to say in defense of this "expedited service" that has created the deficiency?

The Committee on Appropriations brought in a bill here which I did not agree to, a bill which I was not in favor of. I was not in favor of cutting off the number of trips which had been given to the western people; but there have been statements made here of trips reduced in time from seventeen to thirteen days at an exorbitant price. Between July 1 and December 31 last this branch of the service has been increased $325,000, creating a deficiency of that amount, and has any gentleman attempted to defend it or to give an excuse which would justify the payment of this sum of money for simply quickening or shortening the time a few hours in which the mails should be carried? As has been said by my colleague from Indiana upon the committee, we have put into this bill a limit of $2,500 upon increase in expedited service. It has been asked why this policy of limitation? It is not now the time or the proper occasion for the Committee on Appropriations or any gentleman to talk about these contracts in which this vast amount of expenditure has been had, or to make charges against any public officer or introduce any evidence which tends to reflect upon their honesty. But does it need any argument to show that where the amount to be gained was $100,000, nay, where the amount to be gained was only $5,000, and where the reduction of the time in which the service was to be done was only at the rate of one mile an hour, in these contracts fraud might have crept in, and it was well that the Appropriations Committee should draw the line somewhere; and in reference to these small or short routes where the amount was not an inducement to fraud, that they should have the benefit of this exemption which we have incorporated in the amendment?

Mr. CLYMER addressed the committee. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed for general debate has expired. The Clerk will now read the bill by sections for amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated so much thereof be, and the same hereby is, appropriated as may be required to meet the expenses of inland mail transportation on star routes for the remainder of the current fiscal year at or within existing contract prices: Provided, That upon any route where there has been an increase of the original contract price during the last or the current fiscal year exceeding $5,000 the compensation on such route shall be reduced to the terms of the original contract on and after the 1st day of March next; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to forbid the payment to contractors of the one month's pay, as is usual in case of reduction or termination of contract.

Mr. ROTHWELL. I move to amend by striking out the last word. Mr. BAKER. Is there not an amendment pending by way of a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that any amendment has been formally offered. The amendment already read was merely read for information.

Mr. PAGE. At any rate it would be in order to perfect the text before voting upon a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands.

Mr. ROTHWELL. Mr. Chairman, I assume that this bill in its present state or some bill of similar character will pass, and I trust whatever is done will be done speedily. I do not support this measure as a matter of choice, but as a matter of necessity. The time for argument on this point has passed and the time for action has come. The Post-Office Department has issued an order which on the 1st of March—only a few days hence—will strike down the star service of this country. Under that order every hamlet, every village, every county town within the United States that is not situated on a railroad will be denied its present facilities of communication with the business world. That order, sir, affects seriously the district which I have the honor to represent. In that district there are one hundred and forty-nine post-offices, fifty-five of those are upon railroads; ninety-four are connected with the star service. Of these ninety-four, fourteen receive daily mails; thirty-four, tri-weekly mails; twenty-seven, semi-weekly mails, and nineteen, weekly mails. Yet, on the 1st of March next, the people now receiving the benefit of this star service, with their habits of business and correspondence established through a series of years, are to have their mail facilities reduced to a service of once a week. Yet toward the building of railroads those people have contributed within the last few years $2,000,000; now, because they are not upon a railroad—even while they are within hearing of the sound of the whistle and in sight of the smoke of the passing engine, they are for a week at a time to be deprived of all knowledge of what is transpiring throughout the country. Sir, this is an unjust discrimination—not justified by the circumstances of the country. The position in which we find ourselves is unexpected and extreme. It is not sufficiently explained. No warning was given to us of the immense deficit until the 8th of December last. We could not apprehend it from anything that was then occurring in the country, or that had occurred previously. It comes to us with the simple explanation of the increase of mail facilities in the West.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CONGER. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. ROTHWELL.] I oppose striking out any word of this bill, [laughter,] and I want to say why. That brings me directly to the subject under consideration. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] has injected into his speech to-day as strong a political and theatrical effort explaining his condemnation of what is being investigated by his committee as he introduced here on another occasion, except that to-day he did not mount the rostrum by going to the Clerk's desk. The tears, the tremulous tones, the attack, all correspond. The scenery is all here; but it was not all used. I will not dwell upon that in the five minutes allowed me. I simply remark that the gentleman and his friends, before making this attack upon republicans, (for I have nothing to do with the question of the administration of the Post-Office Department,) first obtained a limitation of the time for debate to two hours; next they allowed all that might be said on this side of the House to be said; and then, as the curtain was about to drop, the gentleman came in here with his tirade against republican principles and republican policy, shutting out the possibility of reply in the way of general debate and compelling us to answer under the five-minute rule the great logical argument of the gentleman and his violent partisan diatribe.

But I am not going to confine myself to that. The gentleman informs this House (and it is of this I wish to speak) that yesterday or the day before his committee brought in a bill with a unanimous recommendation as a right bill.

Mr. CLYMER. The gentleman is certainly mistaken. I hope he does not intend to do me injustice.

Mr. CONGER. Somebody said the bill was reported with the unanimous recommendation of the committee.

Mr. CLYMER. It was not I.

Mr. CONGER. Now, to-day the gentleman comes in and says that notwithstanding such was the unanimous recommendation of his committee, they have to-day brought in another bill with a unanimous recommendation; and the gentleman tells us (it may have been truth escaping by an effort or by a slip of the tongue) that the bill which the committee unanimously reported a day or two ago was substantially wrong, and that they have amended it. What shall we do with a committee who tell us one day that their bill is all right, or substantially right, and the next day come in and declare unanimously that the bill was substantially wrong. Did that committee get any intimation from members of this House that their recommendation was unwise and unsafe? Of course they did. They have learned from hearing what members of the House said about their bill, not only that it was substantially wrong, but that it could not be passed. So to-day they have come in here and reported a bill which the gentleman says is substantially right, and they ask that this bill be passed.

Sir, I had desired that there might be an opportunity for gentlemen to express their views upon this general subject without being confined to the short, spasmodic efforts of five-minute speeches. I have not time even to open this subject so as to enable the eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania (who is now asking the Chair to recognize him) to reply to me in his five minutes; but if I can gain the floor after he shall have attempted his defense of what he has said, I will do so, and may yield five minutes more to him.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROTHWELL. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I renew it, and yield my time to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. ROTHWELL.]

Mr. ROTHWELL. Mr. Chairman, much has been said in this discussion about the great West and the rights of the great West. Twenty-five years ago, when I was a boy, having been reared in the heart of the State of Missouri, they told me that was the great West. And now it seems the great West is in New Mexico and Arizona and Colorado, and that the State of Missouri is no longer in the great West; and although paying more than $1,000,000 into the national Treasury for the postal service, she is on the 1st day of March next to be stricken down and all her social fabric cut off from connection with the Congress of the United States, from their established business, and all for the sake of young America in New Mexico, Arizona, Colorado, and Nevada.

God knows I would not harm one hair in their heads, but I would put a spelling-book in every hand. I would give them a daily mail, and I would give them all the facilities, if possible, which they desire. But do not shear a State which has been so long in the Union as Missouri; do not deprive it of the ordinary privileges which have hitherto been guaranteed to our forefathers and their children there for the purpose of nursing into premature manhood the younger States and Territories.

Why, sir, we used to wait. I remember a time when if we received a weekly mail we thought we were blessed. The time eventually came when we fell heir to the privileges of the older States of Illinois, and Indiana, and Ohio, and the East, as civilization marched westward, and we in our turn had our semi-weekly, tri-weekly, and daily mails. Now, under the operation of the new civilization which comes from the West we are to be stricken down for the sake of increased facilities to these young States and Territories, who have not like us borne the heat and burden of the day.

Mr. Chairman, it is not facilities as to daily mail that I object to, for in the statement which lies before me, and which is submitted by the Post-Office Department, it is shown they have a mail six or seven days in the week. They could have had it and can have it at much less cost. It is not the service to which I object, but the great, unusual, and, as I believe, the unnecessary and exorbitant expense. We are informed by the Department that on the present basis of the star mail service there will occur in this fiscal year the enormous deficiency of $1,700,000. Yet in the same communication which conveys to the Congress this astounding intelligence we are informed that in the years from 1876 to 1879 there was a surplus of $3,965,468.27 of appropriations made for the benefit of the postal service covered back into the Treasury, and we know as matter of fact for the purposes of the star mail service for the present fiscal year Congress appropriated the sum of $5,900,000 based upon the estimate of the Department, and being all that it required. Now that same Department asks an additional appropriation in the same year of $1,700,000, and this before the expiration of one-half of the year.

Sir, so great a deficiency, so sudden and unexpected, should have some very apparent cause. It is attributed by the Department to the "rapid growth, population, and business in the Territories and the new States, and the restoration and improvement of the service in the Southern States." No details are given. We are not informed in this connection what specific restoratives and improvements of the service in the Southern States have been made, nor at what places nor to what extent the rapid growth of population and business in the Territories and the new States has taken place, as to create such a sudden demand for increase of mail service and justify the Department in asking at our hands this additional appropriation of $1,700,000. No Southern State is mentioned nor is the name of any Territory or new State given; no particular instance is brought to the attention of Congress.

The whole subject is left in vague generalities and we are now asked to make this great appropriation blindly, relying merely upon the demand of the Department or to find out as best we can the causes which influence it.

Now, sir, when we consider the service in the Southern States we find nothing there to account for the deficiency claimed. There has been in that quarter of the country no such sudden, unusual, and extensive increase in the service. In fact, we discover they have not received their proportionate share of the service as compared with some other States. I have not now time to enter into particulars. Such are the representations of members of those States upon this floor and such the records of the Post-Office Department show the fact to be.

When we turn to the Territories and the new States in vain the eye searches for any adequate cause for the condition in which the Department now finds itself. I admit, sir, there has been growth of population and business in the Territories of the West and the new States, but on examination it will be found generally to have followed the lines of railroads and is distributed along them or in their immediate neighborhood. I admit there are some exceptions, but not nearly so numerous as is implied in the vague language of the Department. But, sir, from statistics furnished by the Post-Office Department itself we are enabled to know that more than half of the deficit claimed is occasioned by the new methods of service upon only twelve routes in the Indian Territory, Dakota, Texas, Montana, Wyoming, New Mexico, Arizona, Oregon, and California, and not by the service itself.

At the time the contract was let for carrying the mail upon these twelve routes they in the aggregate extended over fifty-one hundred and forty-eight miles. The trips per week for all the routes were thirty-five. The aggregate contract price of service upon all the routes, $249,269.25, or at the rate of $7,122 per trip. Since the letting of the contract upon these routes under competition, the number of miles has been increased ninety, making the whole number of miles of these twelve routes fifty-two hundred and thirty-eight. Ten of these routes have been given each seven mails per week and two have been given six mails per week. Thus the number of trips per week have been increased from thirty-five to eighty-two, an increase of forty-seven trips per week. The pay to the contractors, without competition and without bidding, has been increased $934,990.03, thus increasing the outlay from the original payment of $249,269.25 to $1,184,259.28, making the cost per trip at the present time $14,442 against $7,122 per trip at the original letting. Thus we have an increase of the cost per trip of $7,320, or more than double; and yet it stands to reason the cost per trip should have been less, since the stations and general superintendence of the smaller service would generally answer for the larger.

Sir, the Department has not informed Congress why this rule, so reasonable and well-established in all private affairs, should not equally apply to the star mail service. And, sir, allow me to say that the Department in its failure to give this explanation has laid itself open to surmise and criticism. I do not charge, Mr. Speaker, that the Department has acted from improper motives. I leave that for others to say now, and the future to unfold, but I do say, sir, that it is unfortunate that a Department of this Government should stand in this attitude before Congress and the country. And I trust, sir, for the sake of all, some reasonable and satisfactory explanation shall hereafter be made. I simply state the facts. But, sir, when we look into the working of these twelve routes in detail, the general result is not mended but made worse. Take, for example, the route from Soledad to Newhall, in the State of California. The original contract provides for seven trips per week, at a total cost of $29,000. Without increasing the number of trips the cost has been increased to $55,424.33, an increase on this one route of $26,424.33. How is it explained? Simply on the theory that the speed has been increased. Here, then, we have $29,000 for carrying the mails by contract and $26,424.33 for going.

Mr. Chairman, it is not the carrying of the mails daily nor the original cost of their carriage to which I object, but it is this gratuity of $26,424.33 to which I object, for it is little else than a gratuity. Take again, the route from Fort Worth to Yuma, in the State of Texas. The original contract was for carrying the mails on this route daily over fifteen hundred and sixty miles at a cost of $134,000. The route has been shortened one hundred and thirty-four miles, or to fourteen hundred and twenty-six miles, at present. The number of trips has not been increased, the service is still a daily service; but, sir, the cost has been increased from $134,000 to $299,000, an increase of $165,000, with the distance shortened—more than double the original contract price. For what? For speed. How much speed? Considering the shortening of the route, three days, Mr. Chairman, in Western parlance, the game is not worth the powder. This great increase of outlay cannot be justified on any supposition, to say the least of it, consistent with that prudence and economy that obtains in private business affairs; and I am considering this, sir, as simply a business matter. The people of this country cannot afford to pay the money for the whistle which the Government has been blowing on this Yuma route.

Take another and last instance. The route from Phoenix to Prescott, one hundred and forty miles in length, in the Territory of Arizona. The original contract price was for a service of one trip per week at a cost of $680. The service has been increased to seven trips per week. Certainly, sir, the pay should not have been increased more than seven times, or to $4,760. But, sir, the pay has been increased to $32,640.32, an increase of $27,880. Thus the pay, instead of being increased seven times, the most that could be claimed by anybody, has been increased more than forty times. Mr. Chairman, I forbear comment. I confess my inability to solve this mathematical mystery. Allow me to say, notwithstanding, I believe what my youthful confidence has treasured up, that figures will not lie. I allow nothing to destroy my well-founded convictions of the truth of the eternal principles of addition, subtraction, and division. But, sir, the sword the Government uses to cut so handily this Gordian knot is speed. It is not the carrying of the mails that costs so much, but the speed. Sir, had we not better go a little slower and have more money. Times are hard, money is scarce, property and wages low. Are the people in condition to afford this ornamental speed, and if they can afford the speed ought it to cost them more than the service itself?

Sir, I was raised in the West, where it is permissive to go a little fast. I may admit I was raised a little fast myself. [Laughter.] We are considered a little fast, if you please; out West we call it progressive. But, sir, this mail business seems only a little too fast. It is far ahead of our idea of economical service. As I have stated before, I intimate nothing against any man or any Department. I reserve my judgment until the committee having the matter in charge shall bring before this House the testimony and I shall sit as a jurymen. But I protest against this enormous increase. I say it looks strange to me. It is a very large sum to me. It may be the novelty of the situation. I was never called to look into these great matters before; but in the West, and in Missouri, where we are carrying the mails for 25 per cent. less than has been done for years and until the circulation was withdrawn and business reduced to the basis of hard money, this great and increased outlay on these and other routes, of which I have given a specimen, could not be justified, and from my knowledge of the facts I cannot give it my approval.

Mr. Chairman, allow me in conclusion to say that I would not act meanly or niggardly in this matter toward the new States or Territories, nor indeed to any part of this country; I would do justice to all. I would put every town, hamlet, village, and neighborhood in communication with every other in this broad land and with the great centers of business and intelligence. I would not take away from them the stage-coach and the welcome sound of the horn and the mail-rider on horseback. With us there should be no restriction upon news. The permanence and glory of our institutions rest upon the wedded beauty of virtue and intelligence. Our national genius is nurtured in the common school and tutored by the press. These institutions are at once the source of our power and the support of our integrity. One prepares us for the duties of American citizens, while the other by its counsels directs, and by its fearless, free criticisms restrains within the path of public rectitude. Sir, I would have the mails carried regularly to the remotest parts of the country, to every State and every Territory, but I would have them at the same time carried economically. I do not insist upon reduction of service, but reduction of useless and extravagant expense in the conduct of the service. I shall at all times, I trust, cheerfully vote for needed supplies; but never, when I know it, one dollar more.

I hope, sir, that this bill will pass and a check be put upon what I conceive to be the abuse of a great discretion. This, sir, is all.

Mr. PAGE. I rise for the purpose of offering an amendment to the first section of this bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. Before that is done, I wish to move an amendment.

Mr. PAGE. My object is to protect—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky withdraw his pro forma amendment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to move an amendment.

Mr. PAGE. I am on the floor, and have been recognized by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California has the floor.

Mr. PAGE. I move to strike out all after the first proviso in the first section. I ask the Clerk to read the words which I move to strike out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That upon any route where there has been an increase of the original contract price during the last or the current fiscal year exceeding $5,000, the compensation on such route shall be reduced to the terms of the original contract on and after the 1st day of March next; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to forbid the payment to contractors of the one month's pay, as is usual in case of reduction or termination of contract.

Mr. PAGE. Now read the first section as it will stand with what I have proposed stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, so much thereof be, and the same hereby is, appropriated as may be required to meet the expenses of inland mail transportation on star routes for the remainder of the current fiscal year at or within existing contract prices.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I submit I was entitled to be recognized, representing, as I do, the Committee on Appropriations in charge of this bill. I yielded simply to allow one or two gentlemen to be heard in five-minute speeches. I wish now to be recognized, the formal amendment having been withdrawn; and it seems to me only just that as the organ of the committee I should be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from California.

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not yield nor intend to yield for such amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understood the gentleman.

Mr. BLOUNT. The Chair misunderstood me.

Mr. PAGE. I only desire to say a word. I have offered the amendment to strike out all after the proviso in the first section of the bill, which would then provide money enough out of the Treasury of the United States to maintain the star-route service as it exists to-day up to the 30th day of June of this year, to finish out the fiscal year, and retain the mail service as it exists to-day. If my amendment is adopted, that closes the whole thing and the mail service is to go on as it is now.

I will now yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BLOUNT. Do I understand the amendment of the gentleman is pending?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then I offer as a substitute the following.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer it as a substitute for the original bill?

Mr. BLOUNT. No sir; as a substitute for the first section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the sum of $970,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to meet the expenses of inland mail transportation on star routes for the remainder of the current fiscal year at or within the contract prices as they existed on February 1, 1890: Provided, That upon any route where there has been an increase of the original contract price during the last or the current fiscal year for expediting the delivery of mails on any such route at the rate of more than $2,500 per annum the compensation for expediting service on such routes shall be reduced to the terms of the original contract on and after the 1st day of March, 1890. And nothing herein contained shall be construed to require the reduction of the number of trips per week over such route below the present number. During the remainder of the current fiscal year no further expediting of service on any postal star route shall be made.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this proposition is this: There are two sections which are reported in the bill from the committee and this is intended as a substitute for the first section as reported by the committee. When this bill was reported by me originally as the committee's bill it was supposed at first that it was almost unanimous and that the differences were not very great in regard to it. After another meeting on the subject we ascertained upon discussion that it was the disposition of the committee to make some changes in view of the debate which had taken place in the House and the reasons assigned. We have done this. We have made these changes.

The first section of the bill did not designate any specific amount. The committee did insert in that a sum which, from the figures given by the Department, would be enough to continue the service to the end of the current fiscal year except on all of those routes where there has been an increase for expedition of the service over $2,500 per annum. They struck out the section which provided for $100,000 in the original bill, which provided that $100,000 should be used for increasing the service, and struck off expedition from now until the end of the present fiscal year. So that as to the great portion of the service there are two changes; first fixing the amount to be appropriated for the service definitely instead of leaving it to be ascertained hereafter by estimates. But the bill recognizes that service, and if there should be error in the calculation they recognize that as a deficiency; and if it should be ascertained hereafter, which we do not anticipate, that there is any amount lacking and that there is likely to be a deficiency, when the general deficiency bill comes in we shall be able to insert it. But we do not anticipate there will be any deficiency; for myself I do not apprehend it, or that there will be any difficulty in that direction. The original proposition was simply to put that out of the discussion. The committee, on further examination of the details and after further consultation, finding the great abuse lay in expediting the service, abandoned the idea of reducing the number of trips, as suggested by my friend who represents the district in which Leadville is, and upon his proposition and that of others adopted the proposition that when the increase for expediting the service during the current fiscal year exceeded $2,500 per annum it should be cut down to the original terms of the contract after March 1.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HASKELL. Mr. Chairman, I have only a word of inquiry to make in a parliamentary way before I say anything upon any of the pending amendments. I want to inquire if the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] is the amendment pending to the first section of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the first amendment.

Mr. HASKELL. And if the second pending amendment to the bill and the only one under the rules is the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia?

The CHAIRMAN. That is offered as a substitute for the first section of the bill.

Mr. HASKELL. That is a substitute for the first section. Now, upon the pending amendment which makes a thrust at the expedited service I desire to submit a few facts, without argument, which will be of interest to the House if they will give me their attention for a short time.

I want to read from a mail contract in 1858 and 1860, in the good old democratic days which my friend from Pennsylvania has so outlined for our admiration. Take the route from Independence, Missouri, to Salt Lake City, in Utah, which was originally let at $173 a mile and was expedited under that democratic administration so that it cost $346 a mile; from Independence to Santa Fé, California, which was originally let at $88 a mile and was expedited to cost $176 a mile under that good old democratic administration.

Mr. BLOUNT. May I ask the gentleman a question? Does he think the expedition of service to which he alludes under Mr. Buchanan's administration was right?

Mr. HASKELL. I am not discussing that point now. I am not entering into a criticism as to the correctness of these increases. I am only referring to this in response to criticisms which have been made upon the republican administration of the postal service of this country. On another route, which was originally let at $89, it was expedited to $178; another route, let at $217, was expedited to cost $413. On ten or twelve routes to which I will now refer I will show that there has been a vast increase under that administration, and I will give the amount per mile for each of the twelve: $29, $26, $37, $33, $38, $30, $36, $50, $44, $37, $23, $32. That is the pay per mile on these great (?) enormously (?) swollen routes under republican administration. That is the other side of the case. In 1858 and 1860 $400 a mile against our $23 now.

Let me take route No. 32024, from Vinita to Las Vegas. The distance by the new road is one hundred and fifty miles, a saving of seventy-five miles as compared with the old road. On the mail-route from Fort Worth to Fort Yuma, No. 31454, a distance is saved of ten miles in fifty.

Then the rapid settlements and improvements along the lines of the routes, increasing the service every month, should be considered. Take another of the twelve routes cut down, the great Santa Fé and Prescott route on which there are carried a thousand pounds of mails daily, a distance of two hundred and fifty miles, to a point where in 1874 there was not a house of a white man, and where to-day there are twenty thousand people to be supplied with the mail facilities that have been afforded them by the Department. I could multiply these instances and will have a statement of them published as part of my remarks.

I submit it would be only fair for this House to vote down all substitutes, grant the money needed to run the Government through the small fraction of the year left, and then bring in your bill to prevent what may be alleged here to be abuses in the mail service. For myself, I have no personal interest either one way or another; but I would like to have the expression of this House pure and simple upon the amendment now pending offered by the gentleman from Georgia. I hope that may be voted down, and that the amendment of the gentleman from California will prevail. If we cannot get that, if the House is determined to refuse this service, why then we will stand here representing the West, demanding nothing, but begging for the miserable pittance of a living on our prairies with the best service you will grant us.

The following is the statement referred to by Mr. HASKELL, published as a part of his remarks:

No bill will probably be passed without restrictions as to expedition and increase of service, but such restrictions should be placed on the future and not on the past, which would be virtually a violation of good faith on the part of the Government in its implied contracts, which were for four years, unless the contracts should be previously annulled by the substitution of railroad service or some other customary and usual cause.

There seems to have been no intention to ascertain the effect of the passage of such a bill upon the contractors with the Government for the performance of this mail service—the men who are most vitally interested and to many of whom its passage and such an unprecedented and direct violation of the implied faith of the Government would prove utter ruin.

The saving of distances by the building of direct roads, bridges, and ferries by the contractors to perform the service upon expedited time, and sustaining the same in their own interests, in many cases effects a saving to the Government in the cost of the transportation of its Indian and military supplies equal to twice or three times the amount paid for the expedited service over the sections of lines shortened.

In this connection, upon a section of the route No. 32024, from Vinita to Las Vegas, between Fort Reno and Fort Elliot, a distance by the old military road of about two hundred and twenty-five miles, the distance by the new road is about one hundred and fifty, thus saving seventy-five miles.

On the mail route from Fort Worth to Fort Yuma, No. 31454, a distance was saved of ten miles in fifty on one section.

The rapid settlements and improvements in countries along the lines of mail routes through these Territories should be considered also.

On the Santa Fé and Prescott route, No. 40101, between the military posts of Camp Verdi and Fort Wingate, a distance of two hundred and fifty miles, in July, 1874, there was not a house or the home of a white man. Settlements commenced immediately on the establishment of mail service, and at present there is not twenty miles of the distance in which there are not colonies or ranches.

The improvement and sustaining of good roads by these mail contractors benefit and save more to the settlers directly than to the Government in the transportation of its supplies. This holds good to a greater or less extent on all the service of the Territories and border States.

On the route No. 40109, from Florence, Arizona, to Globe district, the territorial Legislature have appropriated $10,000 toward building a road to shorten the distance, to facilitate the transportation of the mails and mining business.

On route 45103, which carries mails weighing on an average over one thousand pounds, daily, from Carson City, Nevada, to Aurora and Bodie, California, a mining camp, which in three years has increased from two (miners) to fifteen thousand people, a route about one hundred miles in length, the tax upon the contractor toward building one bridge to make the fast time as expedited by the Post-Office Department was $1,100, and for improvement of the road $300 more within this last year, and the tax to the contractor for keeping the same in repair is $200 per month.

In the State of Nevada the average cost of grain fed to the horses transporting the mails is from three and one-half to four cents per pound, and of hay from $35 to $40 per ton.

Mr. COX. I move to strike out the last word.

My friend from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] has spoken with great eloquence on behalf of the magnificent territory of that State. I suppose some gentlemen may be of the opinion that New York has no interest in this western and southern business. But I would remind members that we pay for our own service, and when there is a surplus expenditure to be paid for we pay at least one-tenth of it. It therefore becomes a member of Congress truly representative of the great State of New York, or a congeries of States like New England, to investigate this business. New York has never been, as I said the other day, niggard toward the great West, nor to the South. The great Western Territories of this country will be filled up from the East. I believe in going toward the land of sunset. [Laughter.] It is the land of felicity. But I would not discriminate against our Southern States in this regard.

How does it look when you come to the miles and trips per week and the cost of this service during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879? Take the Southern States, beginning with the imperial State of West Virginia, with its Kanawhas and its magnificent products, going on through Kentucky, and so on. They get only 96,513 miles and thirty-two trips per week, and the cost is $1,979,860. Take now the Western Territories and the four States in addition to Colorado, Oregon, California, and Nevada. What do they get? Three hundred and sixty-one trips per week, and the cost of the service is $2,494,000. All the South is subrogated and humiliated in order to maintain these great long star routes, running away through the Indian Territory, Washington, Idaho, Dakota, Montana, Wyoming, Utah, New Mexico, and Arizona. And what for, I should like to know? Why a few buckboards can carry the mail from place to place over these extensive areas and along those great distances.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] has drawn a glowing picture of the western mail contractor carrying the mails in a four-horse stage-coach. He has told us how he had to build station-houses, buy ferry-boats, and have an army of drivers, stablemen, and station-keepers. But my friend forgets to tell us that whenever a mail contractor employs a stage-coach and four horses it is to accommodate the passengers who travel on his route. Now, will he tell us how many four-horse stage-coaches are employed on the route from Vinita, Indian Territory, to Las Vegas, New Mexico? From one end of this route to the other, save the few military posts along it, I venture to say there are not one thousand white or red men who receive a letter once in six months. The mail is carried in buckboards drawn by one or two ponies or mules. To stock the entire route with buckboards, mules, and other outfit does not cost, at an extravagant estimate, $30,000.

Here are the figures in detail: two horses or ponies in that country can draw a light buckboard twenty miles a day with effect ease. Two horses draw the heavy street-cars on the Washington and Georgetown railroad nineteen miles a day. There are sudden stops and starts in this last service, which tell quicker on horse-flesh than any other kind of work. Then, if the horses and buckboard on this Vinita and Las Vegas route travel twenty miles a day, which is light work, you will only have to have as many way-stations as twenty will divide into seven hundred and twenty-five miles—the length of the route—or thirty-six times. Allow three ponies to a station and we have one hundred and eight. Admit that they cost about $75 apiece—a very extravagant figure—and we have $8,100. Twenty buckboards at $100 each would be $2,000. For stations and other outfit allow $40,000 more, and we have a total cost of $50,100 for the cost of plant. Now for this money invested the contractor gets $150,592.03 a year, or $602,368.12 in four years, the length of the contract term. Is not this an outrageous interest on the investment? Of course there are wages for employes and food for stock; but everybody knows that in that country during a great part of the year the stock grazes, and labor is cheap. Drivers get from $20 to $25 per month. There cannot be more than twenty of them which would make a pay-roll of $400 per month, or $3,600 per year. As many more men care for the horses and stations and their labor ought not to exceed $7,200 per year. Then on a plant of $50,000 and an annual expenditure for labor of $7,200 and $15,000 for keeping of stock, a total of $22,500 a year for expenses, the contractor gets $150,592.03 a year! But I am reliably informed that a great part of the service costs the contractor a great deal less than my estimate allows, because he sublets it for greatly less figures.

Now take another route as an illustration—Las Vegas to Las Cruces, New Mexico, which costs now $91,211.68. The mail is carried, I am informed, by people who have been in that country, by Mexican greasers on horseback. At any rate the contractor gets a man to perform the service for him for $43,000 a year, and pockets the balance of $48,211.68 a year, which in four years will amount to $192,846.72. The pay has been raised on this route from $14,900 a year, the contract price, to $31,211.68 per annum.

Take still another route—Bismarck to Tongue River, Dakota. It was let at an annual cost of $2,350. It has been raised to $70,000 a year. Now Captain Clayton, an intelligent and reliable ex-Army officer, who has been on the survey of the Northern Pacific Railroad all last summer, right along the route from Bismarck to Tongue River, is my authority for stating that the mail over it is carried on horseback, and that one man and one horse does fifty miles a day.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, in having this Post-Office Department legislate for Congress. I want a penalty attached to the law, that whenever officers of the Government violate the law by incurring obligations and making contracts beyond its letter and spirit they shall be penitentiary. That is what ought to be done with those people that undertake to assume the functions of the American people as exercised through their duly appointed representatives.

I am in favor of any mode of restricting this inordinate expenditure. I am in favor of the fullest and most complete examination. I am in favor of the investigation begun by the gentleman from Kentucky being carried to the end; so that if we find there has been fraud and rascality, if all the little schemes and devices have been resorted to which were hinted at yesterday by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] we shall rip it up from the center clear out to its periphery, so that the interests of our people may be subserved by our investigations.

Mr. HAYES. I have but one word to offer in regard to the measure which is before us, and I want to say at the outset that I appear here as a representative of the people of the great West, and so long as I have a voice to raise and a vote to give that voice shall be raised and that vote given in favor of the interests of that people.

I rose, sir, to say that I am opposed not only to the bill which has been brought in here by the Committee on Appropriations, but I am opposed to the substitute which has been offered to that bill by that committee, and I am in favor of the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from California. The only reason which has been urged here for striking down the star service of the great West is simply its cost. It is simply because the Post-Office Department comes before this House and asks for an increased appropriation of $2,000,000 that gentlemen get up here and say they are in favor not only of rejecting that demand but of striking down the star routes through the great northwestern Territories and States. Why, Mr. Chairman, if it is necessary to keep up the service on these star routes, I am here not only to vote $2,000,000, but if necessary I will vote $5,000,000 to give the people of those States and Territories the mail facilities that they require, and which justice demands they should have. This Government is for the people, and it ought to be run to secure the greatest good to the greatest number. When the great West, with its immense growth in population and wealth, comes forward and asks for money to give its people proper mail facilities I am in favor of granting the request, even though by so doing we increase the appropriation already made for the Post-Office Department by the sum of $2,000,000.

I have nothing particular to complain of, Mr. Chairman, as far as my district is concerned. I presume there are not twenty-five miles of postal routes therein that have not service on them such as the people demand. I appear here not particularly to speak for my own people, but to speak for the people of the far West that have not these facilities that my people have. And I am sorry to hear gentlemen like the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who have their daily mail or perhaps a mail two or three times a day, come up here and advocate a theory that would strike down and take from the hardy pioneers of the West the mail facilities which they now have.

We hear another point argued on this floor. It was stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER,] who has talked here about the violation of the law on the part of certain Government officials. Sir, that is not the question in issue at all. When this Committee on Appropriations which is investigating the Post-Office Department shall come in here with a report which will establish the fact which they have assumed, that there have been violations of law, that there has been any swindling of the people by any official of the Post-Office Department, then I will be as ready as any gentleman on this floor to vote for punishing that official; but until that time shall come I hold that it is not good taste, that it is not according to the rules of justice that any member of this House should lug that matter in here.

The Appropriations Committee come in here with their bill, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] as a member of that committee gets up here and asks if any one Department of this Government or any one man representing that Department shall be allowed to coerce the House of Representatives into voting a supply of money. There has been no attempt at coercion on the part of any Government official or Department; but if there had been, I ask, sir, if it is not just as proper for that official or Department to attempt to coerce this House as it is for the Committee on Appropriations to attempt such coercion? That committee one day brings in a bill here, and the very next day it comes in and declares that the bill which they first reported does not amount to anything and that they have agreed to another bill which they recommend shall be passed. And it is this committee, which is not of the same mind two days in succession, that comes in here, and, while expressing the greatest surprise that any official or Department of the Government should attempt to coerce this House, attempts the coercive policy itself.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COX. I will withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. UPSON. I move to amend the pending substitute for the first section of the bill by striking out "$970,000" and inserting in its place "$1,300,000."

Mr. Chairman, there is not time in the five minutes to which I am limited to discuss this bill as its importance would justify.

The bill now under consideration affects the material interests of eight great States and Territories of this Union. So far as it affects the district which I have the honor to represent upon this floor, if passed, it will strike down seven important mail-routes in that district. And there is an attempt under whip and spur to force the passage of this bill through the House, when, I undertake to say, with all due respect to the Committee on Appropriations, that the members of this House do not understand or comprehend its purport, its operation, and its effect.

The Committee on Appropriations themselves are at sea on this subject. Yesterday they reported a bill which would have saved to the Government only $100,000. They have slept upon that matter, and evidently discovered last night that, from what they imagine to be the temper of this House, it would stand more than they there proposed. Therefore they propose by this substitute, which they have reported to-day, to take from this important service of the country more than $900,000.

Why is that? Have they given any reason for it; have they given any fair, sound, good reason for the bill which they have reported to-day? No, sir. Their mouths have been opened wide, their mouths have been frothing, I might say bloody and on fire, with broad, open, general denunciation of the Postmaster-General and his subordinates. But, sir, have they pointed out a single fraud, have they referred to a single fact in support of the broad general denunciation which they have made here? The Committee on Appropriations have had this matter under investigation for nearly two months. Nearly three months ago the attention of Congress was called to this deficiency. From the very beginning of this session it was understood that there would be a deficiency, and the Committee on Appropriations have had the subject under investigation since that time. I ask you and I challenge them to show where in all the remarks which have been made by the members of that committee they have pointed to a single fraud or have given a single substantial reason why this bill they have reported should be passed and this service should be stricken down.

I undertake to say, so far as this service within my own district is concerned, that it is necessary, reasonable, and proper. The people of that district desire it, they want it, they demand it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I cannot let the opportunity pass without making a few remarks on the bill now under consideration, as the mail service in my Territory will be disastrously affected by its provisions if it should become a law. Seven routes in Dakota, among the most important we have, will be cut down, and some of them rendered comparatively worthless. Prominently among these I am advised will fall the route from Sidney to Deadwood and the route from Bismarck to Deadwood, the former, carrying all the mail from the Union Pacific Railroad destined for the Black Hills, being restored from the fast schedule of fifty hours to the long schedule of eighty hours, and the latter, carrying all the mails from Bismarck, on the Northern Pacific Railroad, that pass over that line for the Hills, must be returned to once a week on a long schedule. It seems utterly impossible for gentlemen living in certain parts of this country to form any adequate conception of the great Northwest or to comprehend its growth and unparalleled development. They measure its wants and necessities by their own surroundings, in which they have seen no change since the day they were born. They cannot understand that away out on the plains, almost under the shadow of the Rocky Mountains, in that strange and interesting country known as the Black Hills, which less than four years ago was a solitude, there is to-day a population of over thirty thousand people, with prosperous, busy, thriving towns; eight newspapers, five of which are daily; school-houses and churches; national banks, large commercial houses; the richest mines in the world; the largest mills and finest machinery for the reduction of ore and the production of precious metals that can be found on the continent.

And they may not know that that mining region alone has contributed to the wealth of this country in bullion during the last year from three to five millions of dollars, which is a low estimate. It will readily be understood by every one, except he who is willfully blind, that the interests of such a community must be closely identified with the people and capital of eastern cities, and that their business relations require the very best possible mail facilities. And yet to those honest, hardy, daring pioneers who have opened up for you that mine of marvelous wealth, and who are daily adding so much to our sources of national prosperity, you begrudge the poor privilege of two daily mails leading in, as they do, from two of the most important railroad thoroughfares in the Northwest. These stage companies, as was so well stated on yesterday by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. HASKELL,] are the forerunners of emigration and civilization. These two lines leading into the Hills one running over two hundred and fifty miles and the other two hundred and ninety through country with little or no settlement, have bridged streams, improved roads, and constructed ferries over rivers, and by stopping at no expense by way of coaches and equipments have made the long and tedious journey not only tolerable but pleasant.

On the route from Bismarck to Tongue River, a distance of three hundred and fifty miles, I am reliably informed it cost the mail contractor the sum of $35,000 to prepare a road, build bridges, provide ferries, construct stations with stabling, &c., in order to make travel and the transportation of mails possible.

And now after an immense outlay of money on the strength of their contracts, which they have always faithfully executed, they are to be told that they have no rights under those contracts which this great Government is bound to respect, nor the people depending on them for their mails any interest in that service worthy the consideration of this House. And why? The friends of this measure talk wisely and with an assumed indignation that is perfectly wonderful against the alleged dereliction of officials, but their reasons for this great wrong to the people of the West are lame and impotent, and will fall far short of being accepted as satisfactory by the country. Out of one hundred and seven star lines on which the service has been increased or expedited, four or five only are found in which anything could be discovered to arouse the suspicion of even a committee in search of matter to justify an investigation.

And I call attention to this fact, that so far in this debate not one fact or figure has been produced to justify the conclusion so hastily and gladly jumped at by certain gentlemen, that the increase or expedition of service on these four or five routes was unwise, unjustifiable, and not in the interest of the public service. Must we be judged by the income returned? How much income did the Government realize from the service on the routes from Saint Louis to San Francisco via Texas, and from Omaha to Sacramento, from 1858 to 1861, when they cost the Government, one running twice a week and the other six times a week for eight months and three trips a week for four months, $1,600,000 per annum? Had these two routes been increased to daily they would have cost over $3,500,000. It was not for revenue that these routes were established and service put on at such great cost, but for the accommodation of the people, to open up the country, to make a highway for settlement and civilization. But now hands are held up in holy horror when twelve routes are found, on many of which there is daily service, costing the Government $2,000,000. From 1850 to 1861 numerous routes cost per mile, for once a week service, slow schedule time, from fifty to over two hundred dollars per mile, while the highest cost per mile of any of the one hundred and seven routes affected by this bill does not exceed $42, and the average cost per mile on these one hundred and seven routes will not exceed $32 per mile, the average cost of the entire star service being $9.24 per mile less than it has been since 1858. The fact is that under the present management of the Post-Office Department the country has cheaper star mail service, and more efficient, than it has had for the last twenty-one years.

But to return. These four or five routes in which gentlemen claim to find something that is crooked and irregular, but which they have failed to make apparent to this House, are made the pretext for striking down and crippling to an alarming degree the star service of the country—no, not of the entire country, but of the West and Northwest. Is there anything wrong in the increase or expedition of service on any of the lines in Dakota? No; but it has been hinted to me that they might get along with a weekly mail in Deadwood. Anything wrong in the service in Colorado? No. In Kansas? No. In Wyoming or Montana? No. In any of the other one hundred and one routes? No; but they must all suffer because, forsooth, a daily mail has been put on some route where, in the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations, it was not required or service has been expedited or increased where it should not have been done and at too great a cost. We who are on the outside and to whom the avenues of information are closed, as expressed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] may possibly in our ignorance be objects of pity. While we may not be able to argue from man to man and from mule to man with the logic of some, we at least have seen a stage line over twenty-five miles in length and know something of the cost and expense of operating such lines in the far West and their importance to the people where railroads have not yet penetrated.

As was stated on yesterday by a member, [Mr. HASKELL,] admitting everything that has been said by the friends of this bill as to the abuse of discretionary power lodged in the Postmaster-General, broad charges of willful violations of the law in the case of a few routes and in creating a deficiency, still can this wholesale onslaught on the remaining service be justified? Why not strike intelligently at ascertained abuses, and not wildly and madly, without justice or discretion, at the entire system? The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] made some strange assertions in the course of his remarks, and among others that we were acting under duress. This House is overawed by the Postmaster-General, threatened, menaced, and all that. But this overshadowing power has been impotent to accomplish all things, and with the fiery declamation of the gentleman still ringing in our ears we cannot say, in the language of the poet—

O eloquence, thou wast undone,
Wast from thy native country driven,
When tyranny eclipsed the sun
And blotted out the stars of heaven!

In what does this alleged duress consist? In the order issued by the Postmaster-General that on the 1st day of March all star service should be cut down to once a week in order to prevent a deficiency in the appropriation. And this after notice of the anticipated deficiency in the present service had been in the hands of the Appropriations Committee since the 6th day of last December.

That order would affect the service all over the country alike. But what will be the effect of this bill? In all the older States, such as Connecticut, and where they have complete systems of railroads, the star service is unimportant and has long been established. Perhaps they have required no increase or expedition of service during the last or the current fiscal year; or, if any has been made it has been on short lines, where the additional expense would not exceed $5,000. So they are not touched by this bill, and saved from the effects of the menacing order, while the blow of hot indignation leveled against alleged abuses must fall on the West, the far West, where the star service is everything to the people and to the prosperity and development of the country. Is this the kind of disinterested justice that members from the older portions of this Union propose to deal out to the Territories and young States lying west of the Mississippi River? If it is I will give gentlemen fair warning that they had better be diligent in the use of their power while they possess it, for the day is near at hand when that power will slip from their grasp and be transferred to the great, growing, liberal West and Northwest.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] made use of the following language:

If the idea of the gentleman from Kansas that we can strike off the expedited service and get off with something like a million to cover the deficiency be correct, very well. We shall have discharged our duty when we—have called your attention to this shameless and defiant infraction of the statutes of the United States. I have said it deliberately.

Meaning the Committee on Appropriations—

I fancied I felt the Dome on the Capitol tremble. Brave words. Are they as just as grave? No, they are not. They do great injustice to the Postmaster-General, virtually charging him with an impeachable offense, and were unwarranted and uncalled for. It is alleged that the Postmaster-General defiantly and shamelessly violated the law in exceeding the appropriations, and yet in the same breath denounces him in unmeasured terms for presuming to cut down the service in order to avoid a deficiency.

I presume if this order had been confined in its operations to the country west of the Mississippi it would have had none of the elements of menace or duress in it. As well stated by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. HASKELL,] there is no deficiency, and will not, cannot be until the end of the fiscal year. This House has been apprised of the fact that if the present service is continued it will result in a deficiency, and asked respectfully to take action thereon. And after waiting two months and a half, during which time the Committee on Appropriations has been as silent as the grave, the Postmaster-General issued the order that has given such offense. If Congress would not provide against a deficiency then he was determined to do it himself. Gentlemen know, or ought to know, that it is utterly impossible for Congress to anticipate one year in advance all the needs and wants of the postal service of this vast domain. And to say that no deficiency must be incurred, that the appropriations must not in any event be exceeded, is simply to cripple the service and say that such exigencies as arose in the rapid settlement and development of the Black Hills and other portions of Dakota, and the springing up of a city like Leadville, like magic, must await the tardy action of Congress before they can be supplied with mail facilities.

Such narrow, contracted, and impracticable views have never before been advanced with reference to this Department in this country to my knowledge. And it is an admitted fact that for years past—and for aught I know it may reach clear back to the organization of the Post-Office Department—the expenditures of this Department have exceeded the appropriations; and I have never yet heard of a Postmaster-General being threatened with impeachment on account of it. After all that has been said about extravagant, non-paying lines, the fact remains true that the expenditures of the Department over the receipts for 1879 were less than they have been since 1866, when the service was partially restored to the Southern States. Now, wherefore all this tempest in a tea-pot? If abuses have crept into the service let them be corrected, and in that work I have no doubt the Postmaster-General and his subordinates will be found willing collaborators.

I wish to call attention to one other fact. When the service was placed on the routes from Sidney and Bismarck to the Hills, the population was comparatively small and the mail matter not large. But the wonderful growth of that country rendered more expeditious mails and better service an absolute necessity. To-day, as I am informed, these two routes carry daily from one to two thousand pounds of mail matter each. If the service on the one is returned to a slow schedule, and the other to a weekly service on long schedule, it will be next to impossible for them to carry the mails. The Bismarck route would have for each trip from one thousand to fifteen hundred pounds of mail that has accumulated at that point for one week awaiting transportation. It would be a virtual destruction of that route, and throw double work on the other routes.

Much has been said on the point that the contractor would be allowed one month's compensation. This in many cases would be next to no compensation for the losses incurred. But while I urge that justice should be done to the men who in good faith have entered into contracts with the Government, and on their strength have expended large amounts of money, I more earnestly plead for the rights of my people to necessary mail facilities and that they shall not be made to suffer by reason of any abuses in other parts of the country. In my judgment, there has been no increase nor expedition of service in Dakota that have not been demanded and made necessary by the growth and development of the country, and they should not be disturbed.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I move to amend by striking out of the first section all after the word "provided."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that to be the amendment of the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. Then I will move to strike out the last word of the amendment of the gentleman from California.

Sir, it seems that at every returning session of Congress, when the question is brought forward of making appropriations for the Post-Office Department, the star service is to receive all the hard blows to be visited upon any division of that service. Gentlemen seem to forget that for one hundred thousand miles of railway service and for the free-delivery system in one hundred and one cities the Government is obliged to appropriate the sum of $17,500,000. Yet if the House should adopt the amendment of the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE,] and give the star service the amount which it requires, the cost for the entire year for that star service would be only $7,500,000, a little more than one-third of the amount which is given to-day for the railway mail service and the free-delivery system in one hundred and one cities.

We should recollect that the star service is a service which is more effectual in building up our western empire than any other system that has ever been developed. It is a service which has been called into existence by the wants of that mighty empire. Although that service to-day may result in a loss to the Government, in the course of ten years the returns from it will dwarf into insignificance all the benefits which will result from any of the other great enterprises which have been put in operation.

And there is another thing. If we wish to strike at the root of the evil, let us not forget that one or two years ago we fixed the compensation of the general superintendent of the railway mail service at $3,500, and the compensation of his division assistants, some of them operating in four States, at $2,500 a year each. Yet it is a fact that in Baltimore, New York, Boston, and every city of that size in the United States, the postmasters of those cities are allowed to fix the compensation of their employés. And in some cases the compensation of employés who occupy a third grade lower than the superintendent of the railway mail service, and a second grade lower than his division assistants, are paid $4,000 a year, while those who are their superiors in position receive only from $2,500 to $3,500 a year.

If evils are to be corrected, let us get at the root of the matter; let us legislate in such a way that justice shall be done to all parties; let blows fall where they should fall. When we are legislating upon a question of this sort let us see that we do no injustice to sparsely settled portions of the country; for about all the benefit they get from the legislation of Congress is in the daily mail which comes to their doors. They feel this benefit practically. They say, "Congress has given us this; and it is practically all that we do get." Those parts of the country a few years hence, when brought nearer to the older settled portions by railroads and by the advance of civilization, will in turn give to those who are settled on the utmost limits the same advantages which they themselves now enjoy at the hands of Congress. No appropriation that you can make for the great West will be commensurate with the return which the great West brings to the East. No power that you can exert here will bring about that fruition which the great West has given to the country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on this section and the pending amendments. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. ATKINS. I suggest that we take a vote. I think the Committee of the Whole are ready to vote.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the committee are ready to vote, I withdraw my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE.]

Mr. CALKINS. I rise to make an inquiry. Does the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] move that the committee rise to limit debate? Is that motion pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdrew that motion upon the understanding that the Committee of the Whole desired to proceed to a vote.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not understand that we want to vote now. If the gentleman withdraws that motion, I desire to claim the attention of the committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. If there is to be an effort to continue debate, I may just as well move now that the committee rise so that the House may make an order in regard to closing debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia insists on his motion that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to; there being—ayes 121, noes 70.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SCALES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4736) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriations for the transportation of the mails on star routes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that when the Committee of the Whole shall resume the consideration of House bill No. 4736 all debate on the first section and pending amendments thereto be limited to five minutes.

Several MEMBERS. Say one minute.

Mr. BLOUNT. Very well.

The question being put on the motion of Mr. BLOUNT, as modified, to close debate on the first section and pending amendments in one minute, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 105, noes 81.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to resume the consideration of House bill No. 4736.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SCALES in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4736) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriations for the transportation of the mails on star routes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] to strike out in the first section the proviso which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That upon any route where there has been an increase of the original contract price during the last or the current fiscal year exceeding $5,000, the compensation on such route shall be reduced to the terms of the original contract on and after the 1st day of March next; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to forbid the payment to contractors of the one month's pay, as is usual in case of reduction or termination of contract.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 88, noes 102.

Mr. PAGE called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PAGE and Mr. BLOUNT were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes 119. So the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. UPSON to amend the substitute of Mr. BLOUNT by striking out "$970,000" and inserting "$1,300,000;" which was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the following substitute offered by Mr. BLOUNT for the first section:

That the sum of $970,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to meet the expenses of inland mail transportation on star routes for the remainder of the current fiscal year, at or within contract prices as they existed on February 1, 1880: Provided, That upon any route where there has been an increase of the original contract price during the last or the current fiscal year for expediting the delivery of mails on any such route at a rate of more than $2,500 per annum the compensation for expedited service on such route shall be reduced to the terms of the original contract on and after the 1st day of March, 1880. And nothing herein contained shall be construed to require the reduction of the number of trips per week over any such route below the present number. During the remainder of the current fiscal year no further expediting of service on any postal star route shall be made.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Georgia whether the substitute offered by him is submitted by unanimous consent of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. BLOUNT. It is.

The question being taken on the substitute offered by Mr. BLOUNT, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 153, noes not counted.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the further sum of $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, as aforesaid, to enable the Postmaster-General to place new service as authorized by law, and the further sum of $100,000 to increase the service on existing routes, including those on which a reduction has been provided for by the preceding section: Provided, That no increase shall exceed the rate of $5,000 a year upon any one route.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to amend the section just read by striking out all after the words "authorized by law," in the fourth line. I ask the Clerk to read the section as it will stand if this amendment be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the further sum of $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, as aforesaid, to enable the Postmaster-General to place new service as authorized by law.

Mr. PAGE. I want the Committee of the Whole to understand that the amendment now offered strikes out $100,000 of appropriation for the star service.

Mr. HAWLEY. And we raised it $269,000 in the first section.

Mr. PAGE. I want the committee to understand the amendment strikes out $100,000 appropriation for the increase of the star service on routes which may be deemed proper by the Post-Office Department in the future.

Mr. BLOUNT. Oh, no!

Mr. PAGE. Yes, it does. I should like to have the Clerk read the lines to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the further sum of $100,000 to increase the service on existing routes, including those on which a reduction has been provided for by the preceding section: Provided, That no increase shall exceed the rate of $5,000 a year upon any one route.

Mr. PAGE. Now, Mr. Chairman, as I said before, that amendment of the gentleman from Georgia proposes to strike out the $100,000 placed in the hands of the Postmaster-General for increase of star service for any route necessary in the future. I hope this committee will not do this. I am pretty well satisfied that the solid South when recruited from this side of the House is invincible. I want to call attention to this provision.

Mr. ATKINS. The only gentlemen on this side who voted with the gentleman from California were from the solid South. Not a single northern member from this side of the House voted with the gentleman.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, this proposition allows to the Postmaster-General the right to put new service where there is no service at all now. The object is to allow service to be put on. The number of trips is not fixed. The other section was stricken out for the purpose of preventing what the committee regard, what I take it the House regarded, as the most mischievous portion of the service under the present operation of the law in regard to postal contracts, to wit, the expedited service. It is that this $100,000 may be used except for that purpose. The committee understand a large portion of the year has already gone by, two-thirds of it; that a large amount of service has been already put on, and that this is a provision for the fractional portion of the year, and this amount is deemed sufficient.

Mr. BELFORD. I wish to ask the gentleman a question, with his permission.

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. BELFORD. I understand the gentleman from Georgia proposes to strike out a part of the bill which he recommended yesterday to this House favorably. If it were right yesterday to continue that proposition in the bill, how does it become wrong to-day? If it had the approbation of the committee, then why is it that it now is rejected?

Mr. BLOUNT. I take a great deal of pleasure in answering the gentleman. The committee yesterday were unanimous on the bill as they presented it. It was urged there should be a further meeting, and, after conference as to the condition of the service, the committee finally concluded to put it in the shape in which it now is. It is impossible for me to do more than to state this generally, for within the time allotted to debate I cannot give the figures from which the deductions of that committee were made.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. A word only as to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the service is provided for by increase of $270,000 to the first section. Expedited service is cut off; therefore $100,000 is not necessary for expedited service. A hundred thousand dollars for the balance of this year is amply sufficient for new service.

One word as to a remark which fell from the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE.] This is a matter of dollars and cents—for Congress to determine whether or not this service as it is now run is a wise one. My own opinion is that the expenditure on some of those territorial routes to the full extent it is being made is not wise.

As a Representative having a voice in making the laws for the United States, I express that preference boldly and freely and fearlessly by my word and by my vote. I have no quarrel with any gentleman upon either side of the House who believes to the contrary. In politics I am a republican; yet I stand, in all questions of expenditure of money out of the Treasury of the United States, upon my character and my freedom as a Representative. And, sir, no crack of the party whip in the hands of the gentleman from California, talking about riders on appropriation bills or reinforcement from the "solid South," will affect me in the least. I take notice that this side of the House was reinforced from the solid South as well as that side was reinforced by some from this side.

I want to say, sir, politics has nothing to do with this question. If it is to be made a political test whether these $2,000,000 are to be poured into the lap of half a dozen contractors on these numerous paid routes, then I am not a politician.

Gentlemen have talked of the great West and its development. I thank God the West has developed; I am of it and proud of it, but I have yet to learn that half a dozen contractors on this enormously increased service represent the great West.

I believe the action of the committee has been wise. It is not as radical as I would have had it, it is not as radical as I advocated, but it is as radical as this committee thought was wise and just, and perhaps it is radical enough. Now I have always attempted to bow with good feeling and good temper to the action of the committee and of the House, from necessity first and from a sense of propriety next.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Chairman, I have not participated in the debate on this bill at all. I have had my eye on one section or one clause of the second section of the bill which I hope will remain in this section, for in that clause I find relief to a large number of routes in the district which I represent. If this amendment be stricken out, or this item of $100,000 be stricken out, there is no provision then in the amended bill to increase the service on any route which has been cut down during the present year. For instance, at the beginning of this current fiscal year there was upon many routes a service of three times a week. Since the 1st of July in my district on a great many routes that service has been cut down from three times a week to once a week.

Now, from various districts there come to me a complaint and request that there shall be an increase. There are many routes in my district which have heretofore had mail three times a week which now have it but once a week, and if this $100,000 be stricken out of the bill there is no provision at all to return to the service as it was at the beginning of the present year. The first section of the bill makes no provision for it whatever. It provides for another class of routes and for another kind of service altogether, and has no reference whatever to this class to which I allude.

Now, I trust that this amendment will not be adopted, because it strikes out these shorter routes which have been reduced during the year, because of this very kind of legislation or administration of the law, against which so much has been said and against which the gentleman from Pennsylvania is complaining.

Mr. CLYMER. Under the first section of the bill provision is made that the compensation on the routes shall be reduced to the terms of the original contract on and after the 1st of March next.

Mr. DUNNELL. Now, I care nothing about that point. But suppose that there is service on a route three times a week, and under the administration of the law from the 1st of February last this service is cut down to once a week. Now, where is any provision in the bill to bring it back to three times a week? That is the point that I am making.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. Chairman, I only wish to explain to the House a matter which the gentleman from Minnesota does not seem to understand. In the bill reported from the committee yesterday, it is proposed to cut down all contracts where there had been both increased and expedited service. The committee, however, thought that on some of the routes where increased service had been put a wrong might be done. In order to right that wrong a discretion was given to the Postmaster-General in the second clause giving him $100,000 for the increase of service. But now under the present bill we do not interfere with the post-routes so far as the number of trips is concerned, but only with the expedited service. We give all that is necessary for the number of trips which was authorized on the 1st of February, 1880. We cut down only on expedition. Therefore there is no necessity for the $100,000.

I say to the gentlemen on the other side I am really surprised when we on this side of the House manifest such a liberal disposition—and when I say the other side I mean the majority on the other side—that when we manifest the liberal disposition we do to give $1,070,000 of deficiency which was unauthorized by law, I think we ought to be met in a proper spirit by the gentlemen on that side, and there should be a unanimous vote for the proposition.

Mr. DUNNELL. I can say to the gentleman from Ohio that he does not understand it.

Mr. CALKINS. I move to strike out the last word. Now, Mr.

Chairman, whether the bill presented yesterday to the House by the Committee on Appropriations or the substitute which has been offered by my colleague [Mr. BAKER] be adopted, I wish only to say that in my judgment neither would have gotten twenty-five votes in this House, if I understand them properly, except for the fact that they contain provisions stripping a great many gentlemen representing country districts of any interest in either of them. If you strike out this minute the provision in the bill, that where the expense does not exceed $2,500 for expediting the service, you cannot pass the bill, nor do I believe it will get twenty-five votes in the House.

Now, what I am opposed to is the principle contained in the bill. What is it? You had an explanation of it yesterday by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] and by all the gentlemen who spoke upon the subject. Why, said they, we only strike poor little Colorado, with one vote in this House. We only strike Kansas, with three, and the eight Territories that have no voice at all upon this floor, and Texas and California. The rest of you are hushed down. It does not hurt you, but the Committee on Appropriations propose to leave the House with the scalps of eight Territories and three or four Western States dangling at their belt.

When I asked my colleague, the gentleman from Indiana, if the principle upon which this bill was founded was not wrong, and, if not, why not let it apply to everybody, he failed to answer me. They have all failed to answer that question to this moment. It makes no difference if all the money had been squandered which we appropriated last year for the carrying of the mails; it makes no difference to us in acting upon this deficiency bill even if it were stolen. The question is: Are we to have mail facilities? Are the mails to be carried to our people? That is the question. The other question we will deal with when we come to it.

I was surprised to hear some gentlemen say that the men in the Territories might put up with one mail a week, while you gentlemen who have seats here upon this floor have your mail brought to the Capitol and delivered to your seats at an expense of thousands of dollars annually, and this notwithstanding the city post-office is within a stone's throw of your Capitol. How can you under such circumstances go home to your constituents and justify yourselves for this action of the House? I stand for the weak, and it will be the proudest day of my life if, when I retire from this Hall, the people who knew and heard me here shall be able to say that whenever it was undertaken to exercise power against the weak my humble voice was for them as against the strong. [Applause.]

I want to say another word; but the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] desires to speak, and I yield the balance of my time to him.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PAGE. I ask, then, to be recognized in my own right. I desire to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.] I was not aware that anything I had stated here to-day was of a nature to "rile up" my amiable friend, Mr. CANNON. I certainly intended to say nothing that should reflect on his action in the committee or elsewhere. I did indulge in a little pleasantry about the solid South, and it was a mere pleasantry, as you all know, for there is not a gentleman on the other side of the House who does not know that I have been as liberal in my political views and my action on this floor as any gentleman here.

I wish to say that in my action here to-day I have been governed by a direct purpose to benefit my people. As regards almost every route on which the service was expedited or increased and which is affected by this bill, the Legislature of my own State, at its session before the present one, had memorialized by concurrent resolution this body for the securing of this mail service. And when the gentleman refers to three or four mail contractors, let me tell him, Mr. Chairman, that mail contractors never consult men who have no influence simply from the fact they are not on committees that hold the purse-strings of the country. Mail contractors when they want anything from this House go to the party or to the men who hold the purse-strings, and not to humble individuals like myself or my colleagues whom I see around me who have no influence and no power to be heard unless in so far as they can beg a few moments from the Appropriations Committee when it makes a report.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to offer an amendment, and ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] to withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. CALKINS. With the consent of the committee I will withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. I object.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was not agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. The Clerk read as follows:

In section 2, line 4, after the word "law," insert the words: Or increase the service upon existing routes other than those reduced by the first section of this bill.

So that it will read:

SEC. 2. That the further sum of $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, as aforesaid, to enable the Postmaster-General to place new service as authorized by law, or increase the service upon existing routes other than those reduced by the first section of this bill.

Mr. DUNNELL. It will be seen that this amendment which I offer does not increase the amount proposed by the gentleman from Georgia. If it be adopted, the section will say that that $100,000 may be applied, first, to put on new service, or, as provided by my amendment, to increase the service which has already been reduced. I do not think the gentleman from Georgia can object to that. It does not increase the amount.

The question being taken on Mr. DUNNELL's amendment, it was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] to the second section.

The question being put, the amendment was adopted.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SCALES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4736) to provide for the deficiency in the appropriations for the transportation of the mails on star routes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and had directed him to report back the same to the House with amendments.

Mr. BLOUNT. I now move the previous question upon the bill and amendments.

Mr. WHITE. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. CLYMER. Oh, no; this bill must be passed by the 1st of March.

Mr. WHITE. I withdraw the motion.

The previous question was then seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The first amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole will now be read.

The Clerk read the first amendment, which was to amend section 1 of the bill so as to read as follows:

That the sum of $970,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to meet the expenses of inland mail transportation on star routes for the remainder of the current fiscal year, at or within contract prices as they existed on February 1, 1880: Provided, That upon any route where there has been an increase of the original contract price during the last or current fiscal year for expediting the delivery of mails on any such routes at the rate of more than $2,500 per annum the compensation for expedited service on such routes shall be reduced to the terms of the original contract on and after the 1st day of March, 1880. And nothing herein contained shall be construed to require the reduction of the number of trips per week over any such route below the present number. During the remainder of the current fiscal year no further expediting of service on any postal star route shall be made.

The question was taken upon the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The next amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was to amend section 2 of the bill so as to read as follows:

That the further sum of $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, as aforesaid, to enable the Postmaster-General to place new service as authorized by law, or to increase the service upon existing routes other than those reduced by the first section of this bill.

The question was taken upon the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. UPSON. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, there being but three in the affirmative.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REDUCTION OF DUTIES.

Mr. MORRISON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4751) to reduce duties in excess of 50 per cent. ad valorem on all articles embraced in Schedules A, B, C, E, K, L, and M of section 2504, Revised Statutes, and not subject to internal-revenue tax; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHITE. I move that the House now adjourn.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FORTRESS MONROE.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting estimates for repairing the building at Fortress Monroe, Virginia.

Mr. GOODE. I move that that communication be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHITE. I will withdraw my motion to adjourn for the purpose of allowing—

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman withdraws his motion the Chair will recognize members to present propositions.

Mr. WHITE. I will withdraw the motion only for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The motion cannot be withdrawn conditionally. The motion of Mr. WHITE was then agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows, viz:

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 27, 1880.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, inclosing a letter from Powell Clayton, of Arkansas, and an accompanying affidavit, in relation to the affidavit of J. J. Sumpter transmitted to Congress with the report of the Hot Springs commission; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting the proceedings of a board of survey, from which it appears that certain men of Company K, Sixth Infantry, were sufferers by the destruction or damage of articles of their clothing in their efforts to extinguish a fire at Fort Stevenson, Dakota Territory, and recommending that authority be granted to issue clothing in lieu of that damaged; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 27th ultimo, a report from the Secretary of State relating to the claim of Max Bromberger against the Government of Mexico; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4736) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriations for the transportation of the mails on star routes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 3058) authorizing the remission of duty on an altar from Rome, Italy, for the Saint John's cathedral, of Indianapolis, Indiana; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented the memorial of William Painter, president of the Peninsula Railroad, of Virginia, and president of the Worcester and Somerset Railroad, representing 80 miles of railroad, remonstrating against a reduction of the duty on steel rails from $25 to $10 a ton; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives from that State to support the bill in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I also present a joint resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin in relation to financial legislation by Congress, in which it is recited, "that in the opinion of this Legislature Congress might seriously endanger the existing condition of trade and commerce by legislation on financial questions, and that therefore such legislation should be avoided." I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY presented the petition of Charles K. Radcliffe, editor and publisher of the Lake County Star, Baldwin, Michigan, praying for the passage of a bill placing wood and straw pulp, soda-ash, and other chemicals used in the manufacture of paper on the free list, and to reduce the duty on printing-paper used for books, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BALDWIN presented the petition of the publishers of the Michigan Christian Advocate, of Detroit, Michigan, praying for the reduction of the tariff duty upon printing-type; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of Henry Bonn and others, manufacturers of cigars, of the first district of Illinois, praying for a reduction of the tax on cigars to $4 per thousand; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of Myers & Co., wholesale druggists of Cleveland, Ohio, representing the Western Wholesale Druggists' Association and the wholesale druggists of New York City, in favor of the repeal of the law taxing perfumery, cosmetics, and medicinal preparations; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PENDLETON presented the petition of 24 heads of families of the Indian band of Pottawatomies, praying the passage of a bill for the early settlement of their claims by the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. Virginia Grove, of Pensacola, Florida, praying the passage of a bill granting relief to Missonri Hiner, daughter of David Hiner, deceased, late a naval pensioner; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WITHERS presented the petition of William H. Pront, publisher of the Gazette, at Gordonsville, Virginia, and Rhodes & Davis, editors of the Virginia Missionary, praying for the passage of a bill placing wood and straw pulp, soda-ash, and other chemicals used in the manufacture of paper, on the free list, and reducing the duty on printing-paper used for books, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JONAS. I present the memorial of the Greenville and New Orleans Packet Company and others, and ask that it be read.

The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

The memorial of the Greenville and New Orleans Packet Company, Thomas P. Leathers, and others.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, owners of steamboats plying upon the Mississippi River and its tributaries, respectfully present this their memorial to Congress:

Your memorialists show that they have for years past suffered large pecuniary losses, and that their interests have suffered materially by reason of the desertion of crews and parts of crews of steamboats; that the evil has culminated during the past winter, causing great injury and damage to all concerned in river navigation, or in any manner dependent thereon.

That crews ship for the round trip to certain designated points and back to the port of departure; that the peculiarities of the trade require the steamboats to make numerous stoppages at intervals of a few miles, thus increasing the facilities for desertion. That the principal business of the steamboats is the conveying of the agricultural products from the country districts to the large centers of trade. That as a general thing the outward cargoes are light, and the labor entailed upon the crews light; the labor and toil commencing on the homeward voyage, when large quantities of cotton, cotton-seed, and sugar and rice are taken on board, at various points along the banks of the rivers. That as a general thing the crews work faithfully upon the outward voyage, but on the homeward voyage, when the weather increases in severity, the hands desert rather than incur the toil and fatigue. That as the banks of the southern and western rivers are but thinly populated, it is impossible to replace deserters, and of the utmost importance to steamboats to preserve intact the crews with which they started. That these desertions in many cases leave the steamboat helpless until assistance is sent from the cities and in all cases retard them, preventing them from fulfilling their contracts, and often seriously interfering with the prompt delivery of the United States mails. That passengers are delayed and their business seriously interfered with. That the delays caused by these desertions often work serious damage and cause severe losses to the planters, whose chances of getting fair prices for their products are often dependent upon the promptness with which these products are placed upon the market; and that thus the hopes and sacrifices of a year are sacrificed to the wanton caprices of a few heedless steamboat hands.

Your memorialists further show that as the only means of communication between most of the points on the rivers is by the medium of steamboats, the interests, comforts, and welfare of a very large portion of the population of the West and South are to a great extent dependent upon the regularity and efficiency of the steamboats.

That these desertions have become so frequent that scarcely a steamboat returns to port without having to record two or three instances of desertion, and that the interests of commerce, the safety of those whose property is invested in such enterprises, as well as the real and well-considered interests of the steamboat hands themselves imperatively demand that this evil be checked. That the expenses of steamboats are very heavy, and any delay causes severe losses, and oftentimes consumes the entire profits of the voyage.

Your memorialists show that the only penalty imposed by the maritime law or the acts of Congress upon such offenders is a forfeiture of all wages; that this penalty is not sufficient to deter deserters, as a voyage seldom extends over a week's time, occupying as a general thing three or four days, and the wages due amount to but a few dollars. That even this paltry penalty can seldom be imposed, as the steamboat hands do not recognize this right, and almost always libel the boat if not paid wages up to time of desertion. That the expenses of bonding, taking testimony, lawyers' fees, &c., are always so much larger than the claim that steamboats are in self-defense forced to pay, and are thus practically unprotected and at the mercy of refractory hands.

That owing to the laborious duties performed by steamboat hands, they are in the busy season paid wages in proportion, getting at the rate of from $60 to $70 per month. That they are only too willing to pay their hands for all services rendered; and that all that memorialists ask of Congress is to pass laws which will compel steamboat hands to a strict compliance with terms of the shipping contract and serve during the whole trip. That the only way to accomplish this end is to enact a law punishing desertion by imprisoning and thus afford to steamboats and other vessels on the inland waters the same protection so liberally extended to sea-going vessels.

Wherefore your memorialists pray that section 4596 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended and its provisions made to extend to the inland navigable waters, and all waters subject to the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Emma B. Butterfield, of Nashua, New Hampshire, mother of James A. B. Butterfield, late of Company A, Second Regiment Illinois Cavalry, praying that she may be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented the petition of J. M. Bigger and others, members of the senate and house of representatives of Kentucky, praying for the passage of a bill to increase the efficiency of the marine hospital service; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of J. C. Riley and others, citizens of Boone County, Kentucky, praying such an amendment of the patent laws as will protect innocent users of patented articles from prosecution as infringers; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present the petition of E. S. B. Tracy, and a large number of other citizens of Chittenden County, Vermont, complaining of the transportation monopolies that now control interstate commerce, and praying that Congress will make use of all its constitutional powers to redress the evils attendant upon that system. I move its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present also the petition of sundry citizens of the same county in Vermont, praying Congress to pass some legislation that will protect the innocent purchasers of patents from the harassing lawsuits to which they are now exposed growing out of the present patent laws, as they conceive. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB presented additional papers to accompany the bill (S. No. 1325) for the relief of J. C. Irwin; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PADDOCK presented the memorial of E. S. Gillett and others, citizens of Nebraska and soldiers in the late war, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of James McCreedy and others, citizens of Nebraska and soldiers in the late war, praying for the passage of what is known as the Weaver bill, to pay the soldiers in the late war the difference between the value of greenbacks and gold at the time they were paid; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VOORHEES presented the petition of Alexander Montgomery, lieutenant-colonel United States Army, of Georgetown, District of Columbia, praying for compensation due him as major and quartermaster from July 25, 1863, to June 13, 1864, inclusive; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GORDON presented the petition of Dan Meyers, of the firm of Benton, Meyers & Co., wholesale druggists of Cleveland, Ohio, and others, druggists of New York City, praying the repeal of the law imposing a tax on perfumery, cosmetics, and medicinal preparations; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

ADDITIONAL COPIES OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 179) authorizing the Public Printer to print additional copies of bills and other public documents, have instructed me to report it with amendments, and to ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Printing were, in line 5, after the word "documents," to insert "hereafter;" in line 6, after the word "distributed," to strike out "heretofore," and after "added," in line 8, to insert "on giving the notice required by section 3809, title 45, of the Revised Statutes;" so as to make the joint resolution read:

That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to all applicants copies of bills and reports and other public documents hereafter printed by order of Congress, and distributed from the document-rooms of the Senate and House, on said applicants paying the cost of such printing with 10 per cent. added, on giving the notice required by section 3809, title 45, of the Revised Statutes.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have an explanation of the joint resolution from the Senator reporting it.

Mr. ANTHONY. The joint resolution explains itself. It authorizes the Public Printer to sell at cost, with 10 per cent. added, any copies of bills, reports, or other documents ordered by the authority of Congress, subject to the provision of section 3809 of the Revised Statutes, which requires that the person desiring such documents shall notify the Printer in advance, and pay him the estimated cost, and 10 per cent. added.

Mr. COCKRELL. Notice must be given to the Printer in advance?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

CONSTANTINO BRUMIDI.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1358) for the payment of certain moneys to the heirs of Constantino Brumidi, deceased, to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I am also directed to ask the immediate consideration of the bill. I presume there will be no objection to it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was, to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Elena Brumidi, of Rome, Italy, and Lawrence S. Brumidi, of Washington, District of Columbia, children of Constantino Brumidi, deceased, the sum of $500, one-half to each, being the amount reserved from the last voucher paid him for painting in fresco the picture on the canopy of the Dome of the Capitol; and also to pay the sum of $200 to defray the funeral expenses of said deceased; said payments to be made out of the moneys appropriated by an act approved March 3, 1879, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes," said appropriation being in the language following: "To pay C. Brumidi, for retouching and blending the picture in fresco on the canopy of the Dome of the Capitol, and for constructing a scaffolding under said picture, $700."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF COLORED EMIGRANTS.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the bill (H. R. No. 3258) for the relief of colored emigrants, which was reported by the Finance Committee a few days ago and which went to the Calendar by virtue of an objection by myself and perhaps other Senators. My objection at that time was not based upon the merits of the bill but upon certain circumstances surrounding its introduction of which I need not speak. I apprehend there will be no objection whatever to the passage of the bill, and I ask the Senate to consider it.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope that will be done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Indiana for that purpose as soon as the morning business shall have been concluded. Reports of committees are now in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WALKER. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4244) for the establishment of titles in Hot Springs, and for other purposes, to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and recommend that the substitute be passed. I also submit a report to accompany the bill, and move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALKER. Inasmuch as the time is short within which legislation must be had upon this subject, I wish to give notice that on Wednesday next I shall seek to call up this bill for consideration by the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At what hour on Wednesday?

Mr. WALKER. Immediately after the morning hour.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, who were directed by a resolution of the Senate to examine into the rights of the Senate in regard to the allotment of the rooms in the Capitol lately occupied by the Court of Claims, submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. VEST. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1327) granting permission for the erection of certain statuary upon the buttresses in front of the sub-treasury building in the city of New York, to report it with an amendment; and I ask that the bill be read and considered at this time. It is a mere formal matter, and I am satisfied that there will be no objection to it.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The bill ought to provide, if it is to pass, for the thing being done in some way under the superintendence of the proper officers of the United States, so as not to injure the building, and to make these monuments secure in their place against falling upon the heads of the people. These gentlemen ought not to be allowed to take possession even of the outside of the building under their own absolute control, as this bill leaves them. Therefore I think, as there are pension claims on the Calendar, the bill had better go over that that point may be looked into.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made to the present consideration of the bill, it will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 464) for the erection of a public building at Montgomery, Alabama, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 489) for the relief of James P. Worrell, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. EATON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 1380) to provide for the payment of salaries of diplomatic and consular officers while in the United States under orders from the State Department; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. GROOME, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1071) granting a pension to George Wylie, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Martin J. Deponai, late a private in Company E, Eightieth New York Volunteers, praying to be allowed an increase of pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

REPORT OF LIBRARIAN OF CONGRESS.

Mr. VOORHEES, from the Committee on the Library, reported the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the annual report of the Librarian of Congress be printed, and that the usual number of 500 extra copies, with paper covers, be printed for distribution by the Librarian.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 25th instant approved and signed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 80) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to transport contributions for the relief of the suffering poor of Ireland.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4736) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriations for the transportation of the mails on star routes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GORDON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1381) to amend the act giving approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PLUMB asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1382) to establish certain post-routes in the State of Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. PENDLETON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1383) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to adjust the accounts of certain bands of Pottawatomie Indians in the States of Michigan and Indiana, and pay any arrears of annuities due to them under treaties of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PLUMB asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 85) for the relief of the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Gulf Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. MAXEY, Mr. TELLER, Mr. SAUNDERS, and Mr. GARLAND submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (H. R. No. 4736) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriations for the transportation of the mails on star routes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

BILL RECOMMENDED.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Some time since I reported a bill (S. No. 557) to authorize the payment of prize-money to the captors of the steamboat New Era No. 5 and cargo from the Committee on Naval Affairs adversely, and it was postponed indefinitely. I should like to have the indefinite postponement reconsidered and the bill recommitted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to reconsidering the vote by which the bill was postponed indefinitely? The Chair hears none; and the bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

DEATH OF SENATOR HOUSTON.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN, it was Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate is directed to communicate to the House of Representatives the resolutions of the Senate in reference to Hon. GEORGE S. HOUSTON, deceased, adopted on the 26th of February, instant.

WASTE OF WATER.

Mr. ROLLINS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they hereby are, directed to inform the Senate whether within the last year any investigations have been made in reference to the waste of water, and if so, when and for what time such examinations were made, in what sewers and sections of the city the same were made, and transmit to the Senate copies of any reports made upon this subject, with a statement of the action taken by them in reference thereto, and generally what action has been taken, and what means have been or are used to prevent undue waste of water in the District.

CANCELLATION OF POSTAGE-STAMPS.

Mr. KIRKWOOD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be directed to communicate to the Senate such information as may be in his possession touching a suit recently determined against the postmaster at the city of New York for damages for the alleged unauthorized use of a patented instrument for canceling postage-stamps, and particularly the number of such instruments bought and used in the post-office at New York City for each year and in the aggregate during the time for which damages were claimed in said suit, the prices at which manufacturers are willing to furnish such instruments free of royalty to the inventor, and the amount of the judgment recovered in said suit against the postmaster at New York.

MEXICAN AWARD.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President, if not inconsistent with the public service, be requested to inform the Senate what action, if any, has been taken by him under authority of section 5 of the act approved June 18, 1878, entitled "An act to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868, and of the grounds of such action, and what further action, if any, the honor of the United States may in his opinion require to be taken in the premises.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The resolution ought to be modified so as to read "that the President, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interests." That is the usual form.

Mr. MORGAN. Let the Secretary so modify the resolution.

The resolution was considered and agreed to.

RELIEF OF COLORED EMIGRANTS.

Mr. VOORHEES I renew the request that I made a little while ago to have the House bill No. 3288 considered.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3288) for the relief of colored emigrants. It admits free of duty all clothing and other articles, being charitable contributions or the avails of charitable contributions, imported in good faith for the relief or aid of colored persons who may have emigrated from their homes to other States, and not for sale, and all such articles imported and now in bond; such articles are to be delivered only to State or municipal corporations, or to some society or institution established for charitable purposes, and the importers or consignees are to give such security as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe for the payment of lawful duties on such articles, should any of them be sold, or used contrary to the provisions and intent of the act, which is to remain in force until February 1, 1881.

Mr. BAILEY. I offered an amendment to the bill the other day, which I ask to have reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill:

And the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to pay the cost of transporting such clothing and other articles, from the port where received to their point of destination, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

And in line 18 to strike out "February 1, 1881," and insert "1st day of June 1880."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY.]

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will not persist in offering an amendment to this bill. It would be a virtual destruction of the bill—that is to say, it would compel its return to the House of Representatives. The offer of the payment of the cost of transportation is something entirely needless. The steamers brought these goods to our shores for nothing, and we have many railroad companies that will gladly carry them for nothing. There is therefore no need of offering an amendment providing that the United States shall pay for the transportation.

The limitation of the time, so as to make the law cease to operate on the 1st of June, 1880, instead of the 1st of February, 1881, it seems to me is uncalled for. I have no idea that there will be a continuous stream of charity flowing from a few Quakers in England to our shores.

I hope that the Senator from Tennessee will not persist in the amendment; and if he should persist in it, I hope the Senate will vote it down.

Mr. BAILEY. My reason for offering an amendment limiting the operations of the bill to the 1st of June, 1880, is founded in my knowledge of the character of the persons for whose benefit these gifts are intended. The impression will go out, and by designing men it will be spoken to them and taught to them, that other governments and other people are interfering in their behalf and making gifts to them as an encouragement to their migrating and yielding to the delusive stories that have been told and that are being told to them everywhere in the communities from which the emigrants go forth. Moreover, it will be said that the Government of the United States is encouraging this emigration, and many a poor ignorant man among them will be induced to move to Kansas or to some other western State solely for the purpose of receiving the bounty which he will be told is in store for him when he reaches his place of destination. Therefore I suggest that an amendment should be made limiting the time during which the law shall be operative.

I care little for that matter; but the other point of the amendment I regard as substantial and important. These goods may have been brought to our shores free of charge. The Senator from Vermont says that they will be transported from the port of entry where received to the point of destination free of charge by many railroad companies who will gladly make this concession to them. I do not know that we have the obligation or the bond of any railroad company to do any such thing; but if it is worth while that the Government of the United States should relinquish its duties upon these goods as a charity to these people, certainly it is equally proper for it to pay the cost of transporting the goods. I cannot see how we can divide the obligation of the Government to relinquish the impost duties from its obligation also to transport these goods to the point of destination. Therefore, I shall insist upon the amendment. I shall insist upon it, because I think if we intend to make this gift to these poor people we ought to make it a complete and a perfect gift, and make it of some substantial value to them.

It is objected that the amendment will force the necessity of sending the bill back to the other branch of Congress. Certainly when it reaches the House of Representatives it will receive the prompt attention which it received when first introduced, and the same prompt attention which it has received in the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator is mistaken in supposing that a bill of this kind, if returned to the House, can receive the same prompt attention there that it can receive in the Senate. This bill was passed by the House nearly a fortnight ago. It is a House bill. The articles embraced by its provisions are, as I suppose, second-hand clothing and a lot of woolen blankets, cheap fabrics, but fabrics that will only be useful if sent at once, as the winter is rapidly passing away.

I hope, therefore, there will not be any disposition on the part of the Senate to delay the bill by an amendment of any sort, as it would be delayed if it should be sent back to the House, but that we shall allow these gifts to be sent at once to the place where they may be made useful.

Mr. BAILEY. At the suggestion of Senators about me, and upon the assurance given by the Senator from Vermont, I withdraw the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDUCATIONAL FUND.

Mr. BAILEY. I move that the bill (S. No. 133) to establish an educational fund and apply a portion of the proceeds of the public lands to public education, and to provide for the more complete endowment and support of national colleges for the advancement of scientific and industrial education, be made the special order for Monday week at the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I should like to ask whether, if that bill should be made the special order for that time, it would supersede any business or special order then pending?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The fact of the bill being made a special order would not of itself override the unfinished business. A special order is always at the discretion of a majority of the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. Did I understand that the Senator from Tennessee moved that the bill be made the special order immediately after the reading of the Journal on that day?

Mr. BAILEY. No, sir; after the morning hour.

Mr. ANTHONY. After half past one?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be reported by its title.

The Chief Clerk read the title of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, that the bill be made the special order for the 8th day of March next, at half past one o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am opposed to special orders. By that time there ought to be appropriation bills here, and I do not want anything to interfere with the right of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. RANDOLPH] to take up the matter from the Committee on Military Affairs that he has so often pressed upon the attention of the Senate, nor to interfere with the right of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to call up the bill about the Geneva award, both of which are now passed over by the circumstance of the pending question in regard to the 5 per cent. business being still undisposed of. I think the Senate will make a mistake if it makes a special order of anything except in some very extreme emergency.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senate will make a special order of this bill, for I know of no subject of greater national importance. I do not desire to discuss the merits of the question at this time, but it seems to me that we can have no question before us that interests all parts of our country more than the bill which the Senator from Tennessee has moved be made a special order.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I concur with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] in what he has said in reference to this bill. There is no more important bill before the Senate at this time than this very bill. I hope it will be made a special order, as requested by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. MAXEY. The bill which the Senator from Tennessee asks to be made a special order for the 8th of March has received unusual consideration from the Committee on Education and Labor. It has been before Congress at previous sessions but has been pushed out of the way. As the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] says, I believe this bill is one of great national importance, and it deserves to be set down as a special order. I make this statement as a member of the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BAILEY. I hope the objection made by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] will not meet the approbation of the Senate. No more important question, none that more deeply interests the American people, will be brought before Congress at this session. It is a matter of vast interest to every section of the country. It is a bill to which the people everywhere, so far as my knowledge of the country extends, are looking with a great deal of interest. I think, in deference to the interest that is felt in this matter by the public, it is due that the Senate should make the bill a special order, and take it up on the day mentioned for consideration.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the request of the Senator from Tennessee will be granted by the Senate. A similar bill passed the House of Representatives at a previous Congress after very full discussion. It has been fully considered by the committee of the Senate, and they desire that it should be passed here. It is a bill of great public interest.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When I made the objection in the interest of getting on with the business of the Senate, I did not know what the nature of the bill was. I admit its importance; but I do not think that important bills get any headway or any advantage by being made special orders, and they stand in the way of getting on in the most economical mode as to time with the whole business of the Senate. But if Senators think anything is to be gained by making the bill a special order I shall certainly withdraw my objection and we can try it in this particular case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee that the bill be made a special order for Monday the 8th of March, at half past one o'clock.

The question being put, it was declared that the motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Two-thirds voting in the affirmative?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. All the votes were in the affirmative.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the proper entry be made.

HORTENSIA H. COOK.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the call of the Calendar.

The bill (S. No. 66) for the relief of Hortensia H. Cook was announced as the first in order on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought I objected to that yesterday and it went over; but if I did not object then, I will do so now. I have looked into the case referred to by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PRYOR] yesterday as being a precedent for this bill, and as far as I can understand it from a hasty perusal this morning, it is not a precedent at all, but possibly on further investigation I shall find that it is, as I have been obliged to examine it in great haste. In order that the matter may be looked into and that we may be sure of the ground we are standing on, I think the bill had better go over as a matter for discussion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

JOSEPH N. LEWIS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 299) for the relief of Joseph N. Lewis; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Joseph N. Lewis of $411.22, in full of all claim by him for charges and expenses in connection with the seizure and care of the American bark Amelia, at Port au Prince, Hayti, in the year 1855, while he was commercial agent of the United States at that port.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. If there is a report in that case, I wish to hear it.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. MILLAN on the 29th of January:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill S. No. 239, with the petition and other papers accompanying the same, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully submit the following report:

This claim has already been acted on by this committee at the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, (Report No. 523,) and at the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress, (Report No. 269.) The matter was fully considered, and a favorable report made on each occasion. Having carefully examined the case, we concur in the former action of the committee.

The reports heretofore made, which are substantially alike, set forth the facts upon which the claim is based and the grounds for allowing the same. We therefore adopt the report (No. 269) made at the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress by Mr. HARRIS, from the committee, as follows:

"The petitioner, Joseph N. Lewis, now a resident of Missouri, was, in 1855, commercial agent of the United States at Port au Prince, Hayti. On the 23d of September of that year, as such commercial agent, he caused the seizure at that port of the American bark Amelia, for violation of the neutrality laws of the United States, by reason of her contraband cargo of guns and ammunition. The fact of the seizure was communicated by the petitioner to the State Department, by a dispatch of the 25th of September, 1855. Pursuant to the suggestion of the State Department, the United States steamship Saratoga was sent to Port au Prince to bring the Amelia to New York.

"The petition, which is verified, states that on the passage to the port of New York, as the petitioner is informed, the said vessel was forced by stress of weather and damage into the port of Saint Thomas, where both the vessel and cargo were condemned and sold by the United States, and the proceeds of the sale were paid into the Treasury of the United States. In the seizure and subsequent care of the vessel at Port au Prince, the petitioner expended, of his own money, the sum of $411.22 in gold, as for account of the United States.

"After the departure of the vessel from Port au Prince, the petitioner forwarded to the State Department a statement of the expenses, with vouchers inclosed by him, and notified the Department of his having drawn a draft for $411.22 on that account. The draft was referred to the Treasury Department, and that Department informed the holder that there was no appropriation for its payment.

"The petitioner has, from time to time, appealed to the Department of State and the Treasury Department to refund to him the amount so advanced on account of the Government, and has invariably been answered that there was no appropriation out of which this demand could be paid; and finally, despairing of payment from the Department, in 1874 he appealed to Congress.

"The Committee on Claims of the Forty-fourth Congress submitted the petition to the State Department, and requested any information upon the subject in the possession of the Department. The Secretary of State, after a general statement of the facts, which do not conflict with the petition, adds 'that Mr. Lewis does not appear to have been expressly authorized to make the seizure, nor was that act approved by this Department, or the account for the expenses incurred, as is customary before it could be paid.'

"The seizure was communicated to the State Department at the time it was made, and vouchers for the expenses incurred by petitioner were furnished, and a draft made for the amount, the only reason for the non-payment of which, given by the Treasury Department, was that no appropriation for such payment was made. The Government accepted the seizure with a knowledge of all the facts, and sold the vessel and received the proceeds of such sale, which were covered into the Treasury.

"We are of opinion that petitioner's claim should be allowed, and therefore report the said bill favorably and recommend its passage."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMANDA M. COOK.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1076) for the relief of Amanda M. Cook. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to deduct from any annuities due or to become due to the Cheyenne or Arapahoe Indians $2,000, and to pay the same to Amanda M. Cook, formerly Amanda A. Fletcher, whose mother was killed and herself captured by the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians, in the Territory of Wyoming, in August, 1865, while en route from the State of Illinois to California.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there any report with that bill?

Mr. ALLISON. There is a House report adopted by the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs. The facts are that while Amanda M. Cook was en route from Henry County, Illinois, to California with her sister, mother, and father in 1865, the whole family were attacked in Wyoming Territory by a band of Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians.

Property to the amount of several thousand dollars was taken. Her mother and father were both killed, and the daughters were taken captives, and kept by these Indians for over two years. Now it is proposed to pay her out of the funds of these Indians $2,000 as some remuneration for this capture and detention.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa whether there is a regular fund belonging to these Indians out of which this money can be paid; so that when paid it will not increase the taxation of the people?

Mr. ALLISON. I have here a statement in reference to the funds of these Indians. They have a fund of $20,000 a year under a treaty made with them, out of which this can be paid.

Mr. COCKRELL. Twenty thousand dollars a year! Has Congress the power under stipulations of that treaty to make this appropriation? Does not the treaty require that all claims shall be presented to the tribe and passed upon by the tribe before Congress can order the amount to be paid out of the annuities?

Mr. ALLISON. I think not. I do not think there is any requirement of that kind in a case such as this is. We have done this in one or more instances before, so that I think there is no difficulty in the way.

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me to inquire, if we can do this, why may we not take charge of all claims made by people alleging that a certain Indian tribe has taken their property, stolen their horses, or done other injuries? Do the Indians get any hearing on a bill of this kind? It may have been some other tribe of Indians that committed the wrong.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no question about the facts of the case. Of course this matter addresses itself to the judgment and discretion of the Senate, whether or not a young girl of sixteen years of age who was kept two years by these wild Indians, subjected to menial service and other things, shall have a small portion of their annuity by way of remuneration to her. That is all there is in it. There are two or three precedents.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think that anybody would object if the bill only went that far. I believe that not only should their annuities be taken, but that they themselves should be taken and punished as white people are punished for committing crimes, and not be permitted to go scot-free.

But another question back of this is, whether the Government, the people of the United States, shall become responsible for the wrongful, criminal, tortious acts of these Indians. I have a case before the Committee on Claims, probably arising at this same place, in which a party claims some $4,000 or $5,000 for cattle which were taken by these Indians. I referred it to the Secretary of the Interior, and a letter was received last night—I have not had time to consider it fully—from glancing over which casually I learn that there was no fund out of which the Department could pay the claim, and that they had reported it to Congress. The Indians admitted that they took the cattle and had a good time in killing them and eating what they wanted, after they had driven the soldiers into the fort. That man has suffered; but are all the other people of this country to be made responsible for this wrongful action of the Indians? I hold that they should not be made responsible; but if the Indians have a fund independent of what may be raised by taxation to pay general appropriations, then I am perfectly willing that the last dollar of that fund shall be taken to indemnify parties for their wrongful acts, and that is the only question here.

Mr. ALLISON. I hold in my hand a letter from the Acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated December 10, 1877, in which he says—

Mr. KERNAN. In what year was it that this wrong was done?
Mr. ALLISON. In 1865. The letter of the Commissioner is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, December 10, 1877.

SIR: I acknowledge the receipt, by your reference of the 17th instant, of a letter from Hon. HIRAM PRICE, House of Representatives, which is herewith returned, asking to be informed if any annuities are due, or to become due, the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians.

In reply, I have the honor to state that the following amounts are due said Indians under their treaty of October 28, 1867, (Statutes 15, p. 596,) as follows:

Balance unexpended for fiscal year 1873, annuity in money, (tenth of thirty installments).....	$9,323 20
Due under treaty.....
Annuity in money, (twenty installments).....	400,000 00
Annuity in clothing, (twenty installments, estimated).....	290,000 00
Total unappropriated.....	690,000 00

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. BELL,
Acting Commissioner.

To the honorable THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

There are still $22,000 due these Indians under the treaty of 1867.
Mr. COCKRELL. That treaty has not been abrogated since?

Mr. ALLISON. That treaty has not been abrogated.

Mr. KERNAN. I think I must ask the Senator from Iowa to allow the bill to go over without prejudice. This strikes me to be a pretty dangerous thing to do; and I want to look into it. The Indians have no representative here. I want to look into it a little.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no objection to its standing over. I know it is a hard thing for this poor family that these savages should have attacked a man and his family, murdered himself and his wife, taken his two children captives and kept them for two or three years. Of course if Senators desire time to see whether such conduct as this ought not to be punished in some way, I am perfectly willing.

Mr. KERNAN. I certainly desire time; but I want to say a word now.

We have stipulated to pay to a tribe of Indians certain moneys; and if we open the door to hearing claims fourteen and fifteen years old and fix an amount to pay them that shall be taken out of the Indians' money to pay somebody whom they have wronged, we may get into an awkward position some day and do a good deal of wrong. I want to look into it.

Mr. ALLISON. I agree with the Senator from New York that we ought to look into it very carefully. There are depredations committed every year on white settlers on the borders, and these claims for losses amount to many millions of dollars, and I know of no recent instance where such damages have been paid; but we have in two or three instances, where young girls have been captured and held in captivity for two or three years, allowed a certain sum of money out of the Indian annuities to be paid to them, and I think it is a fair thing to do.

Mr. KERNAN. It may be, but I desire to look into it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. ALLISON. I will hand all the papers in the case to the Senator from New York.

Mr. KERNAN. I asked that it go over without prejudice.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That means that it is to be taken up the first thing to-morrow.

JOHN D. M'GILL.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2804) for the relief of the administrator of John D. McGill; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It appropriates $102 to pay the administrator of John D. McGill for advertising the sale of the property known as the Philadelphia navy-yard in the Georgetown Courier in November, 1875.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there any report on that claim? If so, I wish to hear it read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, made by Mr. HARMER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, December 12, 1879:

By act of Congress approved March 3, 1875, a commission was created to make sale and conveyance of the property known as the Philadelphia navy-yard. Authority was given to advertise the sale, and of the newspapers selected for that purpose the Georgetown Courier was included. The expenses of the commission were to be paid out of the money received from the sale of the property, which included the advertising. All the bills were received and paid except for advertising in the Georgetown Courier, which was not presented for payment until after all the funds in the hands of the commissioner had been expended, and the amount due Mr. McGill remains unpaid.

The Secretary of the Navy says the claim is just, the charges reasonable, and recommends the payment of the amount due.

Your committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOUTHERN MAIL CONTRACTORS.

The next business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (S. R. No. 28) to apply the amount appropriated by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1877, to pay certain mail contractors; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, with an amendment, in line 8, after the word "as," to strike out the words "the certificate;" so as to read "such sum or sums as the Post-Office Department may find to be due said contractors," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am not sure that I understand this matter. Is it a matter that has attracted the attention of Congress for several years past, in regard to the payment of moneys to mail contractors before the civil war broke out?

Mr. KERNAN. When did this claim originate? In what year did this claim originate?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am not able to say. I think the joint resolution had better go over until we have time to look into it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is objected to, and will be passed over.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2787) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALLISON. That is one of the regular appropriation bills, and will probably take some little time for its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

TREASURY PRINTING BUREAU.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1157) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase additional lots of ground adjoining the new building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. COCKRELL. I would ask the Senator reporting the bill to give some explanation of the necessity for it. It is only a very short time since we purchased property there, and it was believed to be sufficient at the time.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. There seems to be no printed report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Shall the bill go over?

Mr. COCKRELL. Unless there is a printed report, or some one will explain it, I object to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

LOUISA M. MANSFIELD.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 143) for the relief of Louisa M. Mansfield.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This bill being reported adversely will be passed over.

ARCHIBALD AND JOHN NELSON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 208) granting a pension to Archibald Nelson and John Nelson, minor children of John Nelson; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll the names of Archibald Nelson and John Nelson, minor children of John Nelson, late private in Company H, Seventeenth Infantry, United States Army, their pension to be in lieu of the pension granted by act of Congress approved June 8, A. D. 1872, to Margaret Nelson, widow of John Nelson, and forfeited by her remarriage.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there a report with that bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. GROOME on the 2d instant:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 208) granting a pension to Archibald Nelson and John Nelson, minor children of John Nelson, after careful examination, report:

That the elder John Nelson was a private in Company H, Seventeenth United States Infantry, and was discharged from the service by reason of the loss of his right arm, caused by a gunshot wound received at Manassas on August 30, 1862. He was placed upon the pension-roll, and continued to draw his pension until his death on October 14, 1872. He left a widow, Margaret, and two children—Archibald, who will attain the age of sixteen on October 18, 1883, and John, who will attain that age on March 18, 1885. Application was promptly made for a pension for his widow and children, which was rejected because it was not proved that the soldier died of disease contracted in the service in the line of duty. The only evidence as to the cause of the death is the affidavit of the widow, who swears that on or about October 7, 1871, her husband returned from his work complaining of feeling badly and suffering great pain in the stump of his arm and in the back; that this pain lasted for several days, but was not considered serious until October 14, 1871, when she became alarmed, and dispatched a messenger for a physician, but before he arrived her husband died. The fact that the messenger was sent, and that the physician did not arrive before the soldier's death, is corroborated by the messenger, who adds the further fact that after the soldier's death he saw the physician on his way to visit the soldier, and informed him of the soldier's death, and that the physician, not deeming it necessary to go further, returned home.

After the rejection by the Pension Bureau of the claim of the widow and children, application was made for relief to Congress, which passed an act, approved June 8, 1872, authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior "to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret Nelson, widow of John Nelson," &c. This pension the widow forfeited by her remarriage on July 14, 1874, and on June 27, 1875, she died. The Commissioner of Pensions, upon being applied to on behalf of the children, decided that the special act, under the provisions of which the widow was pensioned, does not extend the right to the pension to the children, on the death or remarriage of the widow.

We recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I would suggest an amendment to be added to the end of the bill, to wit, "and to continue until they respectively attain the age of sixteen years."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELLEN W. P. CARTER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 382) granting a pension to Ellen W. P. Carter; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. GROOME on the 2d instant:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 382) granting a pension to Ellen W. P. Carter, have carefully considered the same, and report: That the letter of the Commissioner of Pensions, herein quoted at length, fully and correctly explains the case:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
"Washington, D. C., April 5, 1879.

"Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt, by your reference, of the inclosed letter of Ellen W. P. Carter, dated the 25th ultimo, relative to her claim, No. 188521, as widow of A. Carter, and, in reply, to inform you that it was rejected September 2, 1870, on the ground that the claimant's husband was not in the United States service. The claim appears meritorious, as will be seen from the following statement, but there is no authority under the general pension laws for its allowance. It appears that the claimant's husband was a member of the Seventh Tennessee Infantry, which was organized by Colonel Cliff, inside the rebel lines, with the intention of making its way through said lines to join the Federal Army, then in Kentucky. While en route for their destination the rendezvous was found by a rebel scout, who reported the fact, and they were attacked by superior forces and a great number killed, among them Mr. Carter. There are no official records of the organization on file in either the War Department or the office of the adjutant-general of Tennessee, because those who escaped were attached to other organizations; but the above statement is made from the parol testimony among the files of the claim.

"Very respectfully,

"J. A. BENTLEY.

"Commissioner.

"Hon. ISHAM G. HARRIS,
"United States Senate."

Your committee feel justified, upon the state of facts set out in that letter, in reporting back the bill with a recommendation that it pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES O'CONNOR.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 551) granting a pension to James O'Connor; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. PLATT on the 2d instant:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 551) granting a pension to James O'Connor, having considered the same, respectfully report:

That said James O'Connor was first lieutenant of Company F, Twenty-seventh Missouri Volunteers, and while in command of his company, on or about March 1, 1865, his right leg was crushed between two Army wagons, at Cheraw, South Carolina. The injury did not at once disable him, but in marching and wading streams his leg became inflamed so that he could not march, and he was on that account relieved from the command of his company and appointed acting quartermaster of the regiment, in which capacity he served until he was discharged, on the 18th of July, 1865. He did not receive medical treatment while in service, and no record evidence exists of his disability at the time of discharge. His injury is fully established, however, by the affidavits of the colonel and major of his regiment and captain of his company. The certificate of the examining surgeon shows that at present he is three-fourths disabled in consequence of the condition of his leg at the point where he received the injury, and that his disability is permanent. He does not establish by medical evidence a continuous disability from the time of the injury to the present time, and his application for a pension filed March 2, 1876, was rejected March 28, 1878, by the Commissioner, for want of record evidence, and on account of the absence of medical evidence showing the alleged disability existed in the service or at the date of discharge.

The physician who attended him soon after his discharge is dead. His neighbors testify to the existence of the disability at the time of discharge. His present family physician testifies to the present condition of his leg. In view of all the evidence presented, including the certificate of the examining surgeon, the committee conclude that his present disability is the result of the injury received by the claimant in the service and in the line of duty. They therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CITY OF MACON.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired, and the unfinished business is before the Senate.

Mr. GORDON. I wish to enter a motion to reconsider the vote indefinitely postponing the bill (S. No. 111) for the relief of the city of Macon, Georgia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. When was the bill reported?

Mr. COCKRELL. The report was made about a week ago.

Mr. GORDON. The bill was indefinitely postponed some days ago.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Then it requires unanimous consent, the time having expired within which under the rule the motion to reconsider could be entered. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think we ought to know more about it before we go back.

Mr. McMILLAN. It is a bill for the relief of the city of Macon, Georgia, by refunding to that city a tax collected by the General Government upon certain scrip issued by the city of Macon and used as money.

Mr. GORDON. I simply want to get the bill on the Calendar.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am merely stating what it is.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I hope there will be no objection to the motion to reconsider, because the Senator from Georgia happened not to be in the Hall at the time the postponement was moved.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The record shows that the bill was indefinitely postponed on the 17th of this month, on motion of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. McMILLAN.] Is there objection to entertaining the motion to reconsider?

Mr. HOAR. I think I ought to object. I have no objection to having the matter reconsidered and disposed of by the Senate on the merits; then, if the Senate favor the bill after argument, I have no objection to that. What I desire to prevent is the entry of a motion to reconsider which will wipe out the effect of the judgment of the committee of the Senate so that the claim may come up hereafter at another session. A great many claims are presented, reported adversely by the Committee on Claims or some other committee, the adverse report accepted by the Senate, or else it is very manifest that it will be accepted by the Senate, and then some person opposing the conclusion to which the committee have come gets the matter put on the Calendar or reconsidered, and then in another Congress the bill comes up again without being affected in the least by the previous determination. The result of that is that the labors of the committee and of the Senate are altogether wasted.

I shall have no objection whenever the Senators from Georgia ask unanimous consent to take up, consider, and dispose of this bill; I will give my consent for one, but I will not consent to have a motion to reconsider entered and pending.

Mr. GORDON. That answers the purpose, my only object being to have the bill fairly considered by the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I do not object to that.

Mr. McMILLAN. Having had charge of this case and reported upon it, I desire to state that that is the very condition of this case. During the last Congress it was before the committee; it was reported adversely and was placed upon the Calendar at the instance of one of the Senators from Georgia. The Congress closed and the bill was again introduced at this session and referred to the committee and a similar report made. The very circumstances alluded to by the Senator from Massachusetts do exist in this case, and I think myself that if it is reconsidered it should be disposed of.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That is all we ask. We only want a fair consideration of the bill before the Senate on its merits.

MILITARY LAND WARRANT LOCATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business is the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to reconsider the vote by which what is known as the 5 per cent. bill, the bill (S. No. 19) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain and certify the amount of land located with military warrants in the States described therein, and for other purposes, was postponed indefinitely. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. McDONALD. I think the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] had the floor on that motion when it was last considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair was not present at the time.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask the Senator from Illinois to give way to enable me to make a motion.

Mr. LOGAN. I will do so.

Mr. McDONALD. I move that the pending motion and all other questions connected with this bill be postponed until the first Monday in April.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think that is in order, Mr. President. Here is a motion to postpone indefinitely which has precedence of all other motions but one. That motion is agreed to. Then a motion to reconsider that vote agreeing to it is made. There is only one motion I think that can now be made, and that is to lay this motion upon the table, because otherwise you would be rolling over the motions continually.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair does not agree with the Senator from Vermont. He holds in order a motion to postpone the consideration of this motion to reconsider—

Mr. McDONALD. That is my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair does not agree that the other part of the motion of the Senator from Indiana is in order; but the motion to postpone the consideration of the motion to reconsider until the first Monday in April, the Chair thinks is in order.

Mr. McDONALD. That is my motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I understand the Chair to decide that a motion to reconsider, being made, is open to all the motions that the rules provide for, to postpone, &c.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will rule on each motion as it arises.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It must fall within that principle.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it competent for the Senate to decide whether they will consider this motion now or postpone it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I did not know but that the Chair would be willing to hear me a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If a motion to postpone to a day certain, this motion to reconsider is in order, it is in order because the Senate rules provide for it, which say that when a question is under debate no motion shall be received but so and so, and so and so. One is to postpone indefinitely, and another is to postpone to a day certain. Now, I think the parliamentary law is that a motion to reconsider is a motion which stands in exactly the same position that the vote to which it applied stood, and no other; and so in this case it stands exactly in the place of the motion to postpone indefinitely. It is an incident merely to that motion; and, therefore, a motion to postpone to a day certain this motion to postpone indefinitely, certainly nobody would claim fell within the authority of the rule. But if you treat the motion to reconsider as an independent motion entirely separated from the original motion to postpone indefinitely, it is liable to all the motions that the rule provide as to an independent question, one of which is to refer to a committee. Did anybody ever hear of a motion to send a motion to reconsider to a committee? Never.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair regards this as a simple question of consideration, whether the Senate will now consider the motion to reconsider or not, and also that it is a question within the meaning of the forty-third rule.

When a question is pending no motion shall be received, but—

And among the enumerated motions is:

To postpone to a day certain.

This certainly is "a question."

Mr. EDMUNDS. So was the motion to postpone indefinitely "a question," and therefore under the principle apparently adopted by the Chair a motion to postpone to a day certain the consideration of the motion to postpone indefinitely would be in order, which I think would be a somewhat new proposition in any parliamentary body. However, I do not appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. McDONALD. My reason for submitting this motion is that I desire that this question, which I regard as one of very great importance, certainly as affecting the interests of a good many people and quite a number of States, shall have further consideration; and as having charge of the bill from the committee of which I am chairman I do not feel that I ought to press its consideration upon the Senate at this time inasmuch as there are other measures of very great importance that have been already kept back by the long discussion and protracted consideration of this bill.

The request that this matter shall be postponed until the day I have named, is, I think, under all the circumstances, a very reasonable one. At the request of the principal opponent of this bill, the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] I allowed it to be deferred before it was taken up for consideration some two or three weeks, to enable him to make his preparation, and in the order in which things came before the Senate in this discussion he was enabled to close the debate before the vote was taken upon his motion to indefinitely postpone.

There have been statements made in reference to the effect of this bill that may have had their effect in prejudicing the minds of some of the Senators in regard to the amount that might be involved. I have not had time since these statements have been made to get an accurate statement of what could by any possibility be embraced in this bill if it should become a law, but by that time I expect to do so, and hope to be able to present such additional reasons as have induced me to give this bill my support. I have not yet been able to do so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Indiana—a very unusual circumstance with him—is greatly mistaken in saying that the Senator from Vermont was enabled to close the debate. The Senator from Vermont was not enabled to close it; he did not close it; he interfered with nobody, and he did not close it in fact. The honorable Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD,] whom I count as among the gentlemen entitled to the highest degree of consideration in this body, spoke after I did, in support of this bill, if I am not in error in respect to my memory.

Mr. McDONALD. And I think was replied to by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was replied to by me in a remark or two, but not because that ended the debate, for it was open to everybody, as all such things are. There is no ground, therefore, for saying that anybody has been cut off by being unable to reply to the observations that I made.

In the next place, my friend from Indiana is considerably mistaken as to this matter having been postponed two or three weeks for my accommodation in order that I might investigate it before I was called upon to vote on it. It was laid over for a few days once or twice, but it was kept always after it came up at the head of the Calendar where it stands now. Therefore there is no ground upon that basis for a postponement now. But inasmuch as we are to have postponements proposed, and inasmuch as the Chair decides that this is "a question" open to motions, I move to postpone the consideration of this motion to reconsider indefinitely.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is in order.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President, I do not know why there should be such evident feeling upon the part of some Senators in regard to a fair consideration of this bill. As the Senator from Indiana has stated, it was postponed once, and again, and perhaps again, for how many days I do not know, at the instance of the Senator from Vermont, to give him time to look into it. It so happened that I was unable myself, and have been during the pendency of this bill, to look into the laws commented on by the Senator from Vermont and others in regard to it. My committee work, particularly the work of a special committee to which I belong, prevented me from doing so. In the remarks I submitted once or twice in regard to it I had to speak wholly from general recollection. I had not time, and have not had time to examine the laws referred to by the Senator from Vermont in his arguments upon this bill.

I am sure I can say with confidence to the Senator from Vermont that if a bill affecting his State as largely as this bill affects the State from which I come were pending here, and he were to say to me what I say to him, that other duties have prevented me from giving to the matter the consideration which would enable me to present the opinions I entertain fully and clearly to the Senate upon it, I would not resist deferring the matter until he could have the opportunity of doing that thing. That is precisely the position I occupy. From the time this bill has been here until the present time, I have been so occupied otherwise that I have not had time to examine the various statutes cited by the Senator which in his judgment show that this bill ought not to pass.

How the Senate or the country can be prejudiced by permitting this bill to go over until further examination can be had, I do not know. The Senator from Vermont may be able to say. It is true, as stated by him, that after what I had supposed to be the regular order of proceeding with bills of this kind had been reversed, after the bill, instead of being considered as is usually the case upon its merits, had been brought before the Senate upon a motion to postpone indefinitely, and after the Senator from Vermont had concluded his closing argument upon it, I felt impelled by the remarks made by him touching the bill itself, and touching the State from which I come, to make some reply. I thought I should have been derelict in my duty to the State from which I come if I had not done so; but I did not then or at any other time, because I was not prepared then or at any other time to do so, refer to the various statutes and decisions and other matters cited by him. I have not had time to examine them. I have not had time to express my opinions upon them; and it does strike me as exceedingly strange and as more than strange that an attempt should be made to force the final determination of this matter at this time and in this way.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. GARLAND. No, sir; but the next thing to it, [pointing to the adjoining seat occupied by Mr. MAXEY.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, I did not take part in the debate on the 5 per cent. bill when really I considered at times that it was my duty to do so. The State of Arkansas is interested in the bill to the extent of $185,000. When I had the honor to be governor of that State I sent a special agent to the proper Department of this Government in order to have that outstanding business settled. It was not settled, and no very satisfactory response was given for not settling it. I have repeatedly investigated the matter so far as the State of Arkansas is concerned, and I am satisfied that her claim is a just one. I shall not undertake now to give my reasons for that opinion. But the debate here, which was a prolonged one and an able one, developed some circumstances that showed me that there was considerable difference with respect to the claims of the various States among the eighteen States named in the bill, and to that extent there was something new in this proceeding as it seemed to me. My mind at this time, after all this debate, is not satisfied as to the status of the bill before the Senate. I abstained from taking part in the debate because, after the able and somewhat fierce attack made upon the bill by the Senator from Vermont, I sought to see if I could look at the matter in a judicial way, and I exercised the best powers I had in that direction.

After the debate, I am still satisfied that the bill is a proper one and ought to pass; but there are some features about it marking a distinction between the different States that I should like to look further into. Indeed, in the able argument of the Senator from Alabama who sits nearest to me, [Mr. MORGAN,] in opposing the bill, I understood from him that he preferred that the matter should be delayed in order that he might be informed by his State as to the views of her people in reference to this matter.

In view of this fact, I say to the Senator from Vermont and others who occupy his stand, that I do not think they should insist upon a final disposition of the subject now, as I understand will be the effect of his present motion if it prevails. So far as I am a friend of the measure, I do not desire a solitary moment's delay, but I do in good faith ask that this matter be postponed for a few days that it may be looked into, and the distinction that has occurred to my mind in reference to some of these States examined more closely and more thoroughly.

There is nothing unfair in proffering the proposition submitted by the chairman of the committee that reported the bill and who has charge of it. If the public interests or if the interests any Senator has in charge on this floor were to suffer by this course I should not, for one, ask it. I ask in good faith that it may lie over for a few weeks that the subject may be examined more thoroughly.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I desired, as I stated the other day, that this bill might go over until next December so that I might have the advantage of the instructions of the Legislature of Alabama, if they have any instructions to give me in this matter. My request was predicated upon the fact that various memorials from time to time have been sent by Alabama to the Congress of the United States touching upon the general subject of the 5 per cent. from the sales of the public lands. The precise question presented in this bill has not heretofore been discussed before the Legislature of that State, so far as I am aware. I would cheerfully vote for a postponement until December, but it would be no advantage to me personally to have the bill postponed until April or May; I should accomplish nothing by that; and if the motion to postpone is put at April or May I shall be compelled to adhere to my objections to the bill, and consider them as being sufficient to require me to vote against such a motion. If, however, it can be amended by a postponement until December, I shall vote for it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, my friend from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] has taken me to task again on the ground that this is rather hard upon him who has not had time to examine the subject. I should have felt more the force of his appeal if I had not observed that during the session of the 25th of February when late in the afternoon I rose to submit a few observations, not new ones, but merely to repeat the references to statutes and history that had been made before, and it was proposed by some Senator, I think the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] that the Senate should adjourn, the friends of the bill apparently, judging from the yea-and-nay list that is under my eye, were determined that the Senate should not adjourn; they were entirely ready, the subject having been exhausted, to proceed to a vote, and I find the name of my friend from Iowa recorded as voting against the motion to let the matter go over even for one day until the next morning. Now, when the judgment of the Senate has been taken, after hearing him, against his views, he thinks he ought to have further time to consider the subject. If he had said on that occasion that the matter ought to go over because he had not examined it enough for himself, there would have been great force in it, undoubtedly; but having been entirely willing and determined that the case should be decided then, it is somewhat extraordinary as it strikes me that it should be said now that there has not been time for investigation.

In the next place, Mr. President, this case was determined on its merits. My friend from Iowa says that he was opposed to the motion to postpone indefinitely because he wanted the case determined on its merits.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I was speaking of the manner of its consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now my friend says "the manner of its consideration." The manner of its consideration was precisely by the motion that under the rules is provided for making a final disposition of a question adversely and upon its broadest merits. The motion to postpone indefinitely is a motion which involves all the merits of a question, and under it all its merits are always discussed, as they were in this case. So it is quite unsound, I submit with great respect to my friend from Iowa, to say that either the substance or manner of the motion prevented the Senate from considering this question upon its merits. It is exactly what the motion was intended to do, and what it always has done, and what it has done in this case, and what it will do in all future cases. It is not an unusual motion. It is the motion almost always proposed in regular procedure, in a case where anybody is willing to move it, having examined the case sufficiently to be willing to put it upon that ground, as I had. I say then the question has been discussed upon its merits and it has been decided, and the gentlemen who now think that they have not had time to examine the question were the very gentlemen who insisted that it should be decided the other night and that it should not go over even for a single day. That is all I wish to say.

Mr. McDONALD. I will say in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] that I have no objection to the postponement he asks. If the bill should be postponed to the day I have suggested, I should not insist on its consideration then if other measures not yet considered should require consideration. But I do not wish the hard and somewhat unusual motion to indefinitely postpone a subject of so much importance as this to prevail. I am very free to say that I do not wish it to prevail, and I do not think it went to a vote the other day under favorable circumstances, because I am satisfied that more than one Senator voted for the indefinite postponement because he had not yet considered the measure so far as to make up his mind definitely on the question, and preferred to make that disposition of it then rather than take the hazard of voting for a measure that he had not thoroughly considered.

Furthermore, I was not incorrect in saying that the opponents of this bill had, under the circumstances occurring at the time, been permitted to close this debate, for I find, on referring to the RECORD, that the few remarks that our able and distinguished friend from Vermont makes reference to occupy an entire column of the RECORD. That is what he calls "a few remarks in conclusion." His remarks in replying to the Senator from Iowa occupy as much space as the Senator from Iowa took in what the Senator from Vermont calls the closing speech in favor of the bill.

I know, furthermore, that I was not mistaken in saying that there was delay in bringing this bill forward longer than the memory of the Senator from Vermont now recalls, at his request when it was first brought to the attention of the Senate. And I further think that injustice was done to the bill by the statements which were made in his concluding remarks, in which in various forms it was charged by the Senator from Vermont that here was a bill that was to take $10,000,000 out of the Treasury now, and how much more he could not tell, and that it ought to have a closer scrutiny and a clearer investigation than it was possible to give it at that time. When that suggestion was made by that Senator, I asked the privilege of making such correction as the data in my possession then enabled me to make, but I was met by him with an absolute refusal to be interrupted on the question at all.

Now, Mr. President, I suppose the motion to indefinitely postpone the motion to reconsider may be amended by moving to postpone until the second Monday of next December. If so, I move to so amend it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That motion is not in order.

Mr. HOAR. What motion is not in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To amend the motion to indefinitely postpone.

Mr. McDONALD. Then I hope that motion will be voted down; and if it be voted down I shall make the motion I have just indicated.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I wish to say, after the very interesting debate we have listened to on the motion to indefinitely postpone this bill, that I for one have not supported this bill because of any interest that my State had in it. I think it has been stated here that some twenty-nine or thirty thousand dollars would go to Florida under this bill, and the States have been arraigned here in the order of their interest under it to show how they would be affected by the measure. Mr. President, I gave this matter some little thought, and I considered, as I still do, that there is an equity due to the States interested in this measure, not my own especially, because the insignificant sum that would go to her under this bill could not for one moment induce me to give it my support.

I wish to say also that in voting against the motion to indefinitely postpone, I did not feel that I was absolutely committed to the bill in its present form. I think there are many important particulars in which it could be properly amended. Great stress having been laid by the Senator from Vermont upon the fact that the money proposed to be taken out of the Treasury under this bill would be diverted from the trust originally contemplated by the Government when it entered into the agreement with the States, I wish to say here for one as a friend of this measure that I am willing when it comes up again that the bill shall be so amended as to divert the fund in any public channel that Congress may propose, and I am especially in favor of its going into the channel of public education and that every dollar proposed to be appropriated under this bill shall go to increase the school funds of the respective States.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I had prepared an amendment embodying the very thought suggested by the Senator from Florida, and I had proposed to offer that amendment if the bill had been in such a situation that it could be amended; but, of course, in the present condition we are compelled to take the bill as it is presented. I called the attention of the Senate in a few words that I said upon this bill, to the fact that the State I in part represent had no pecuniary interest in it. If we should get 5 per cent. on all the lands entered by land warrants since the Territory was organized in 1861, we should have a little less than $12,000; but the enabling act of Colorado specially provides that this 5 per cent. shall only be paid on the lands entered subsequent to our admission. The enabling act of Colorado, somewhat unlike the others, also provides expressly that the homestead entries shall be excluded from the computation. There might be a claim made on our part at least, that inasmuch as the Government had only provided for the exemption of homestead entries, there was an implied grant that we should have the 5 per cent. upon all other entries.

I am not going into a general discussion of the bill. I said the other night that I thought the bill had been unfairly discussed; I thought it had been discussed in a way that placed all the supporters of the bill in the position of having supported it from pecuniary considerations. I said that was an unusual thing in the Senate, and I thought I was not mistaken when I so stated. I have since looked over the RECORD, and I find that more than one Senator treated this subject as if the advocates of the bill were moved and instigated by the pecuniary results their own States were to derive; I say more than one, yes, more than three, more than that number even. I find by reference to the RECORD that one distinguished Senator characterized this as I never had heard any subject presented to the Senate since I have been a member, over three years, characterized. I find in the RECORD that one Senator spoke as follows of this bill:

Mr. President, I rise to support this motion. Ostensibly on the face of the bill there are eighteen States whose treasuries are to be replenished out of the Treasury of the United States by this—shall I call it performance? And I had hoped therefore I should have the attention of the thirty-six Senators who presumptively, I suppose, by the originators of this bill are expected to lean favorably in that direction; and yet the thirty-six are wanting, Mr. President.

I suppose that if I should charge that this proceeding had been called "a performance" it could be correctly said and honestly said by that Senator, "I never called it a performance." I can take other speeches made here and other parts of this same argument and show that there is through it, and running through it, that same vein. It was not called "a performance;" but the inquiry was pointedly made, emphatically made, "Shall I call it a performance?"

I find that on another occasion the amount of money to be paid was by the same Senator called a "pot." I do not know what that means up in Vermont or in the New England States, but I do know what it means in our country, and I suppose it means the same everywhere. It means money put in to be gambled for.

I find in another place that it was spoken of as "a raid upon the Treasury," and I understand that a raid upon the Treasury is the procuring of money from the Treasury by dishonest means and by dishonest purposes.

I think we were justified on this side, myself as well as other Senators, in feeling that the debate had not proceeded with that usual high courtesy and fairness that characterize this Senate in the discussion of matters of this kind. I thought, therefore, that I was entitled to say what I did say upon this floor, without having it said in reply that nobody would think he was voting from pecuniary motives unless he had first suspected that his own motives were to be impugned. That, I suppose, was a careful, courteous declaration, that unless a man had a guilty conscience he would not suspect anybody of meaning any such thing.

Mr. President, I have not any particular feeling about this matter. I have felt that it was a subject upon which lawyers and Senators might differ. I have thought the bill involved the construction and interpretation of statutes that everybody understands different minds will differently construe, and with the same honest intention and the same desire to promote the public good, arrive at entirely different conclusions. I had arrived at my conclusion in the face of the fact that the State which I in part represent would be a pecuniary sufferer; for while Colorado is the youngest of the States, I can point to several States, much older in years and much more pretentious in this Chamber and everywhere else, that pay very much less to the public revenue than the State of Colorado; and the seven or eight hundred dollars that we were to have, or the $12,000 that we were to have if the construction was put upon this bill that one Senator said might be put upon it, which was disclaimed by the advocates of the bill, by the promoters of the performance, as it is called—if the whole $12,000 should be paid, yet if there is the amount of money in the bill that is claimed, $10,000,000 or $8,000,000, Colorado would be the loser pecuniarily if the bill should pass.

Mr. President, I have not come here to legislate for Colorado. I have come here to look after the interests of Colorado as well as I can, but I shall never while I have the honor of representing that State on this floor fail to recognize my obligation to look to the interests of every part of this great country, including Colorado as well as New England and the Southern and the Middle States. If the bill passes, at least the representatives of Colorado may be exonerated from any desire to get money into the treasury of that State, whether it is characterized as "a pot," or characterized as "a performance," or in any other manner.

Mr. President, I might have been moved the other evening when this question was up to say what I did say from a little feeling of unfair treatment in the general discussion, and a little feeling that a motion made to reconsider the bill by one who was the principal champion against it and pressed then to an immediate vote, was not quite fair. I will admit that there is the parliamentary right to so insist; but I will contend also that, when you do so insist, you virtually deprive the other party, the party who may desire to reconsider, of any opportunity to present their case. It is, I suppose, parliamentary for a member of the minority to change his vote and vote for a bill that he is against, and then move its reconsideration. I believe there is nothing that transcends any rule of the Senate or any parliamentary rule in doing that; and a notice given of a motion to reconsider an adverse vote is always for the purpose of enabling the friends of the bill to rally their associates in its support, if they are not here, to wait until an opportunity can be presented to get them in, or to present other and different arguments in support of the bill from those submitted on its first attempted passage. I thought that I had never seen this proceeding resorted to in the Senate before. If it ever was done since I have been in the Senate, it did not attract my attention, and I am confident it never could have been done in the three years I have been here. I felt that it was an attempt to smother this measure, and not allow a fair public investigation of it, as the friends of the bill had a right to demand.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President, I am not sure that the Chair and the Senator from Indiana understand each other properly. As I understood, the Senator from Indiana inquired whether or not he could amend his motion to postpone until the 1st of April—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending motion is that of the Senator from Vermont to postpone indefinitely. The Senator from Indiana, as the Chair understood, proposed to amend that by postponing to a day certain.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Yes, the 1st of April.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Which the Chair ruled not to be in order. Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Senator from Indiana first moved a postponement to April.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I thought the Chair had ruled that the motion to postpone—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana first moved to postpone to a day certain.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Yes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Afterward the Senator from Vermont moved to postpone indefinitely. That motion has precedence under the forty-third rule of the Senate.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. To postpone indefinitely the motion to reconsider?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Well, Mr. President, I do not know anything about the rules, and I never expect to, and I never expect to take advantage of them or attempt to take advantage of them to defeat a bill. That is all I wish to say about the question of rules.

Now, the Senator from Vermont assigns as a reason why he is pertinacious in pressing this matter that on the 25th of February, a few days ago, the Senate refused, as he says by the action of those who favored this bill, to adjourn, and compelled him to speak after the usual hour of adjournment. The Senator from Vermont certainly did not look at the names of those who voted against an adjournment at that time. Those who voted in favor of adjournment numbered only eleven; those who voted against adjournment numbered forty-five, more than twice the entire number that voted against the indefinite postponement of this bill; so that if the Senator from Vermont has any right to complain of discourtesy or aught else in that vote, the burden of it lies not with the men who supported this bill, but with those who voted with him for its indefinite postponement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not complain then, nor have I complained since, of discourtesy; my argument was directed to another point.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Another word about this matter, Mr. President. I have said that I do not understand the rules and do not expect to understand them during the time I may remain here, but I have stated, and I still think, that it is not the usual mode of dealing with an important bill to meet it when it is first called up with a motion to postpone it indefinitely, especially if it be a bill involving many particulars which may need amendment. As I understand, under the motion to postpone indefinitely no amendment can be suggested. It is the consideration of the bill precisely as it comes from the committee. Scarcely any bill comes to this body or any other deliberative body involving large interests that may not well be considered carefully with a view to whether it is amendable or not; whether it should be amended or not. Twice, at least, during this discussion propositions have been made to amend this bill and ruled out of order and the amendments laid upon the table to be offered when the motion to postpone indefinitely should have been finally acted upon. There has been no chance, there has been no opportunity to amend this bill since it came here. The Senator from Vermont has stood with his motion between this bill and any proposition to amend it. He stands there to-day. Is that the usual mode in which bills brought before this body are considered? Is that fair play?

Mr. EATON. I should like to ask my friend from Iowa at what stage in the debate was it that the Senator from Vermont moved the indefinite postponement?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. When the bill was first called up.

Mr. EATON. The first day?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Yes, sir; when it was first called up. The first proceeding had upon it when it was called up was the motion of the Senator from Vermont to postpone it indefinitely, utterly precluding and cutting off all attempt to amend it.

In a bill affecting as many different States and as many different interests as this, as shown by the argument of the Senator from Vermont himself—he has shown that these different States stand in different relations to the subject-matter of this bill—it must be apparent that the bill requires in many particulars amendments perhaps to make it fully acceptable even to those who have voted against this postponement; and yet the Senator has stood, and stands to-day, utterly preventing any modification of the bill, any amendment of the bill even to meet his own views. Not a single suggestion made by him against this bill can be met by an amendment framed to meet his views in regard to it in the position in which the case now stands. He has suggested certain difficulties in regard to the State of Ohio, certain in regard to the State of Indiana, certain in regard to other States, and yet no amendment can be made in regard to those States in any one particular to make the bill conform to his views in regard to any State. Is that the ordinary mode of proceeding in this deliberative body? Is it fair play? Is it that fairness which should be shown by Senators here toward each other and toward the States they represent? I do not believe it, and with that I leave the matter.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like to be informed by the honorable Senator from Iowa of two things. One is, why it is, if it be true as I understand him now to say, that these claims depend upon different principles, different states of fact, and different considerations, that they are all united in one bill, instead of having, as is usual in cases of claims against the Treasury depending upon different considerations, different states of fact, presented separately, each on its own merits?

The other inquiry I wish to put is why, if it be true, as the honorable Senator from Colorado says, that this is a question of law about which fair minds may honestly differ, is it not sent to the Court of Claims, and through them to the Supreme Court to determine these grave legal matters?

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if we do not settle a great many questions of law in this body without their going to the Court of Claims?

Mr. HOAR. We do, undoubtedly.

Mr. TELLER. Every day?

Mr. HOAR. Undoubtedly.

Mr. TELLER. Why should we not settle this, as well as any other question of law?

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me that a question of law which involves, I will not say which affects, so many interests that Senators represent—I will not impute to any Senator that his vote is affected, although I have heard some not very polite imputations in regard to the votes of Senators who have given silent votes on this question—

Mr. TELLER. Not from me.

Mr. HOAR. No, I have not. It seems to me that this is a case which manifestly ought to go to the Court of Claims and the Supreme Court. If the legal interpretation of these statutes be as is claimed on one side, there is no claim; if the legal interpretation be as is claimed on the other side, there is a sound claim; and I think some contrivance for sending that question of law to the Supreme Court ought to be adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. These States can sue there now.

Mr. HOAR. But these claims were outlawed in many instances before the Court of Claims was created.

Mr. ALLISON. If that be true, may I interrupt the Senator to ask—

Mr. HOAR. I am not arguing this matter, and I wish to add one word. I introduced early in the session a bill with a general scheme for sending every claim pressed by a State against the Government to the Court of Claims, reserving in the bill a power of consideration by Congress having the facts ascertained by judicial machinery and a report of the questions of law which arose.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator what has become of that bill?

Mr. HOAR. It has not been reached in committee.

Mr. ALLISON. Then why not postpone the consideration of this question until we see whether or not the bill proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will cover the case?

Mr. HOAR. My friend from Iowa will excuse me—

Mr. ALLISON. I do not want to excuse the Senator; I only ask that question.

Mr. HOAR. I rose not to suggest difficulties in the way of the friends of this bill or on the other side. I rose to put an honest, simple, straightforward question, why it would not in the estimate of the friends of this measure be a fair and just disposition of it to send it to the Court of Claims? That is my question.

Mr. ALLISON. It is a very fair question—

Mr. HOAR. I was putting it to the Senator's colleague, [Mr. KIRKWOOD,] but I would as lief hear the answer of my friend from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.] I addressed the inquiry to his colleague, because his colleague was on the floor; that was all.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I was not aware that there had been but one question addressed to me, and that was why the claims of all these States were embraced in the same bill. I will state very frankly why I suppose it was done. Although I thought I knew the condition in which the State of Iowa stood, I did not know the condition in which the other States stood, and I supposed they all stood on the same broad ground precisely. This discussion has developed that it is not so.

Mr. HOAR. Now the Senator will pardon me for making my point clear, and I should like to have his answer to it. If it be true, as he now says, that the claim of Iowa rests on one ground and the claim of Colorado, the claim of Illinois, and the claim of Ohio on another, how is it possible that it can be proper to have a bill which in substance says that Iowa shall be paid on condition that Ohio, Illinois, and Colorado are also paid, and so of the others? Of course it is liable to the great objection, which nobody would impute to the honorable Senator as a motive, that it brings together the advocates of different claims and enlists their interests and prejudices all in favor of each other.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. And that is just as good reason why I suppose this thing should be postponed and not acted upon by rejecting every claim in the way in which I have indicated the attempt has been made to dispose of them. The discussion here has shown what I did not know, I am frank to say—not having looked into the matter in regard to other States, knowing only how my own stood—the discussion here has shown that the claims of the States, the interests of the States, if you please so to call them, stand upon somewhat different grounds.

Mr. HOAR. Then, they ought not to be put together.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That may be, or may not be. The bill may be so amended as to embrace them all, and yet give each one its own interest; or it may be that a final investigation of the matter will show that they should stand separately. What the friends of the bill ask is that time and opportunity be given for that purpose. We have had, I repeat, no chance whatever to change this bill as it came from the committee by dotting an i or crossing a t; no time to amend it; no time to shape it to meet the views of the Senators as those views might be formed by the discussion here. We have been compelled by the action of the Senator from Vermont to take it just as it came; to consider it without any opportunity to amend it, and to endeavor to send it out of this Chamber with the brand of the Chamber upon it, and without any chance to make it suit the suggestion made by himself.

Why it should not go to the Court of Claims, I am not prepared to say further than this: It does seem to me that when various States of this Union come before the Congress of the United States and say that in previous dealings between them and the United States they have not received justice, it is hardly consistent with the dignity either of the United States or of the States that claim it, to turn them over to a court. Those States have the right to make their claims, and the right to believe that the Congress of the United States will deal with the claims that they say they make in good faith with equal good faith, and that the appeal made to their sense of justice and to naught else, to their sense of right and to naught else, to their sense of what is due from the central Government to the States, would require them to deal with the question themselves and not turn it over to a court to be dealt with.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, if this bill is one that the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts import that it is; if it is a bill embracing distinct claims, each of which necessarily stands on its own merits, and which are grouped together simply to obtain a support that neither of them would obtain if presented alone—

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President—

Mr. THURMAN. Allow me to finish my sentence. In a word, if it is a mere log-rolling bill, then it ought not to pass. I do not understand—

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me, because he has misstated my position?

Mr. THURMAN. Let me finish my sentence.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator has misstated my position.

Mr. THURMAN. I think not. The Senator from Massachusetts—did not charge that it was any such bill; he was careful not to make the charge; and yet the effect of what he said was undoubtedly to create a suspicion that, although such may not have been the design of the promoters of the bill, yet in point of fact the bill was so framed that that would be the result. Now I will hear the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I beg the Senator's pardon. He misunderstands what I said altogether. The Senator from Iowa, I think before the Senator from Ohio came into the Chamber—the senior Senator from Iowa in age, the one who sits near me, [Mr. KIRKWOOD]—stated that the course of the discussion had developed to him, what he did not know in the beginning, that the claims of other States stood on very different grounds, different facts, different laws from the claim of Iowa; that that was something which had been developed to his mind in the course of the debate; and he complained that that having been developed, he had not had an opportunity to amend the bill. I thereupon rose and addressed him a question, which was this: if that were true, then was it not clear that the measures ought to be brought forward in separate bills? I made no intimation of my own or suggestion of my own, but it was an inquiry of the Senator from Iowa, based upon what he had said in regard to the bill before the Senator from Ohio came into the Chamber.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, if I had heard what was said by the Senator from Iowa, which has now been stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, I should have understood his remarks. At the same time I did distinctly understand the Senator from Massachusetts to disclaim imputing improper motives in any one. That I admit. And yet if the facts be as stated, if these are wholly distinct and separate subjects, then this bill would look very much like a log-rolling bill, whatever may have been the motives of those who introduced it and promoted its passage. A log-rolling bill I have never been able willingly to give my consent to.

I wish to say, however, that in my judgment—and I ask the Senator's attention and the attention of the Senate to the few words I have to say—this is not a bill made up of wholly distinct and independent matters; it is not, as has been said even by some of its friends, a mere question of law, a mere question whether the Government will keep its contract with the several States who are interested in this subject. If it is a mere question of contract between each of these States and the Government, then I see no sufficient answer to the objection made by the Senator from Vermont that the State has had a right to go into the Court of Claims and have the matter settled there, if the Senator from Vermont is right in saying that this is a subject-matter which can go into the Court of Claims and thence to the Supreme Court of the United States. If he is right in saying that it is simply a question of contract between Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, or Iowa and the General Government, and that it may be thus judicially determined, I hold that there is no sufficient answer to that objection to the bill. But I do not so understand this claim or these claims. I do not understand that these claims rest upon technical contract, upon strict rigid law. I understand them to rest upon a much broader equity than that; and if they do not, then I do not understand them at all.

Now, Mr. President, I may say for my own State, although that created some remark the other day from the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] who favored this bill, when the same remark was made by my friend from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN], that this is not a bill in the interest of Ohio. If this bill should pass in its present shape, for every dollar it will give to Ohio it will take more than two dollars and a half out of her treasury, nearly three dollars out of her treasury. I think that is a proper thing to be stated in order that her Senators, however they may vote, may have at least the credit and the acknowledgment that they have not been swayed by the particular interest of their State. And even if the amendment I laid upon the table and gave notice I meant to offer were adopted, still the amount that Ohio would receive under the bill thus amended would be less than she would have to pay out of the pockets of her people in discharge of the debt created by the bill. So that neither my honorable colleague nor myself can possibly be said to be swayed in any vote we may give upon this subject by considerations peculiar to our own State. Certainly it cannot be said that Ohio is here preferring a claim manifestly unjust upon the General Government in order to put money into her own treasury.

And while I am on this subject allow me to say, Mr. President, that of all the new States Ohio has received least from the bounty of the Federal Government. There is not a State that has been admitted into this Union in which there was public domain that has not received far more than the State of Ohio. Although Ohio was the first of the Northwestern States to penetrate that then wilderness, to reclaim it, and to add immensely to the strength and the power and revenues of the Union; although she has discharged her duties according to her best understanding of them from that day to this, she has never been a solicitor of Government favor, and has received less of it than any of the new States of the Union. I do not say that any of them has received too much. I am one of those who believe that the settlement of the western country was a great boon to the people of the Eastern States, and that never did a government bestow such favor upon a people as the Government of the United States has bestowed on the people of the old thirteen States when it gave them homes for their children in the West which brought them fortune, prosperity, and fame.

Sir, it will not do to speak of the Western States as having been beggars upon the bounty of the United States; it will not do to speak of the land grants which have been made to the Western States or for the education of their children, or the support of their ministry, as was the case in Ohio—it will not do to say that those were favors granted by one section of the Union to another section of the Union and money taken out of the pockets of one part of the people in order to be put into the pockets of the other. No, Senators from the old thirteen, it was your children and children's children who obtained these homes in the West. It was you more than anybody else that was benefited by the grants the Government made, and of all the people you ought to be the most thankful.

Now, Mr. President, as I understand this bill, it rests upon a simple proposition. In the enabling act of Ohio the Government promised that Ohio should receive 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands. This bill comes upon the ground that not a narrow legal but a broad and equitable interpretation of that contract, such as a great Government ought to give to it, includes lands that were promised by the Government as rewards for military service. That, as I understand it, is the broad equity of this bill which makes the bill a unit, makes it harmonious, makes it rest upon one general principle, not by any means a log-rolling one, but a bill that one can support on its own merits irrespective of the State that may be its beneficiary.

Mr. President, I have had very great doubts about this bill. I said very frankly the other day that I did not believe, at least I never had believed until I read the report of the Committee on Public Lands in this case, that the State of Ohio could claim 5 per cent. on the valuation of the area of the United States military district and of the Virginia military district in that State. I must say that I am not satisfied yet that she could make such a claim, certainly not in a court governed by the strict principles of law; but I do say—and it was that which induced me to lay my amendment upon the table—that if the broad principle of this bill is to prevail, if Illinois is to have 5 per cent. on the military reservation in her State, and if Missouri is to have 5 per cent. on the military reservation in her State, and if the other States are to have 5 per cent. on lands located with military warrants of the Mexican war and the Black Hawk war, and the like, then that principle includes the State of Ohio and justifies the amendment I submitted.

Entertaining these views of this bill, I cannot concur in the idea, if any one has suggested that idea, that this is a log-rolling bill grouping together different claims neither of which could pass the Senate standing on its own merits but which grouped together and thus getting the support of divers men of divers minds might go through this body. I do not understand it so. I understand it to rest on the broad principle which I have stated, and on that alone, that the military bounty lands granted by the Government for military services, and as I think whether granted before or after the enlistment of the soldier, ought to stand in the contemplation of these enabling acts on the same ground with land sold for money, and that makes the bill a unit resting on one single broad and general principle which if right may sustain the bill, and if wrong the bill must fail.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, as the debate this morning in a considerable degree has seemed to turn on my behavior rather than on the bill itself, I think that in justice I ought to be heard a minute or two. If my behavior could be indefinitely postponed, I have no doubt a motion to that effect would get a unanimous vote; but as there is nothing in the rules for that, the Senate will have to take it as it is.

I stated the other day, when some Senators seemed to feel that something by implication out of what I had said might be derived imputing bias to them, that they were entirely mistaken, that I had the same respect for their motives that I should hope they would have for mine. I see it so stated by me all through the debate the report of which is before me. And what I referred to as a combination of these States, I got from the Senator from Kansas himself [Mr. PLUMB] who reported this bill as the deliberate judgment of the committee in a deliberate report; and here on the floor, after stating that it had been a matter of public notoriety that the Legislatures and governors of the States had been calling attention to this business, that Senator said:

It has been only recently, it is true—within the last few years, as I understand—that the States, moved by a common purpose, have been able to agree, or have agreed, on the terms of a general bill which should recommend that which is fair to all. In the beginning of this discussion, when the matter first came to public attention, there was a variety of claims. The States of Ohio and Indiana, for instance, had claims on account of lands entered under peculiar laws. The States of Kansas and Nebraska, and other States west of the Mississippi River which had been settled up under the homestead law, were desirous of having the Government recognize their claims to compensation on account of those entries. In those States, also, there had been grants, and, as we believe, improvident grants, for agricultural colleges and for railroads, and we believed, and still believe, that the General Government ought to pay in fairness a percentage on those entries as well. But for the purpose of effecting a final adjustment, for the purpose of establishing a common accord upon that which to a certain extent is a common interest, for the purpose of having a final settlement with the General Government, this bill was agreed upon as a basis, perfect or imperfect as it may be, but expressing that general idea of the obligation on the part of the General Government to these States which we believe it ought promptly to respond to.

So that as far as I referred the other night to this matter, of what the Senator from Ohio suggests in a certain aspect as a log-rolling bill, as I did without intending to impute motives to anybody, I was only commenting on what the Senator reporting the bill himself stated, with the candor that belongs to him, that it apparently was a matter of consultation among these several claimants, whose respective claims, as he regarded them, standing upon law and not upon any sense of general legislative equity or generosity, stood upon different grounds, as obviously they do; but nevertheless, standing upon different grounds, he said it was agreed between them, if I correctly understand the remarks which I have just read, that they would make this general bill that should put them all in together.

Mr. President, if they stand upon different grounds,—and so far as the law goes evidently they do, (nobody can dispute that now)—of course, as the Senator from Ohio says, it is a very improper measure to unite them all in one bill. If they are distinct and independent claims standing upon the particular equity, in the legislative sense of that term, that each State has a right to present owing to the peculiar circumstances of its condition, then is it not equally improper to put them in one bill? I am unable to see the distinction.

The only ground upon which they can properly be in one bill, if there were ever so just a claim on the part of one or more of these States, would be that all involved one single principle to be applied in one single way, and that there was no difference in the grounds or reasons applying to the different States, and that the redress in the legislative sense, (leaving the law now,) to which they would be entitled would be identical. If their cases are different, the redress cannot very well be identical, I take it. The remedy follows the right and is to be applied according to the right; and if the right of these States, in the sense of legislative equity or generosity or whatever the Senator from Ohio pleases to call it, is different, as it must be, if there be any right at all, owing to the different extent of these locations in the various States, then there is no ground for a union (because I must be very careful not to use any term that means much just now, I shall be on trial again,) then there is no ground for a union—I hope there is no impropriety in that word; it is a good, patriotic word,—a union of these claims in one bill. And thus the Senator from Ohio has struck the mark, as he usually does, when he says that if this thing does stand on different ground and is not a broad and general equity that is to give so much to each one of these States each having exactly the same interest and having exactly the same wrong to be redressed and to the same extent, then some proper term might be found perhaps somewhere in the dictionary to properly condemn the practice of the Senate in allowing a bill to go on to a discussion at all which made a union of this character of several and separate claims.

But, Mr. President, this bill is pressed on so many different grounds that it is a little difficult to know exactly where to meet it. The two Senators from Iowa, I think the Senator from Kansas, who reported the bill, [Mr. PLUMB,] and my friend from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER,] and I do not know but everybody who has supported the bill hitherto, have said that they were not asking legislative equity from Congress or generosity, or appealing to general considerations—

Mr. TELLER. The Senator will let me interrupt him a moment. I did not say that at all. I simply said that there were involved in the presentation of this case the construction and interpretation of statutes. That is what I intended to say; that is what I meant.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us see what my friend did say, if I can find it.

Mr. TELLER. You will find it there, and you will find that that is what I said.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot find it just now.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator refers to what I said to-day, I suppose—not the other day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As the Senator now states it, I will take it, for he states it as he did before, and no doubt he states it as he intends. When we come to the ground on which we respectively stood, that is of very slight importance; it is really of no importance whatever on the bill, but it is of some importance in respect of the consideration that each Senator owes to all the others. That is a view to which I wish to express my adhesion in the frankest manner that I can and to disavow, as I thought I had before, any intention to wound the sensibilities of any single Senator.

Now I want to consider for a minute what has been said on this occasion. The Senator from Colorado himself said, if I correctly understood him, that the claim of his State stood on a different ground from that of the others for a reason that he pointed out. If that be so, it ought not be in the same bill. The Senator from Iowa complains that gentlemen have had no opportunity to move to amend the bill. Why, Mr. President, this bill came in reported from a committee with a long, full written report and argument in support of it, that did not suggest that there were any amendments which could be made to the bill except what might be implied from their statement that the homestead lands and I think some others would fall within the principle of the bill, but the committee thought it fit to rule them out and make a compromise,—that was the substance of it,—and estop (as the language of the bill is) the States hereafter from making any claim on that account if they should get this. Nobody that rose to address the Senate upon the bill suggested that he had any amendment to offer, except one or two Senators suggested that they had amendments to offer which would enlarge the scope of the bill and not diminish it. The Senator from Florida had one. I think there was still another suggested at the desk for the purpose of embracing more lands in the scope of the bill, and not for the purpose of trimming it down, to putting each case on its own grounds that the Senator from Iowa now speaks of. The Senator from Iowa was here all the time; he was watching and promoting this bill just as he does every other bill that he believes to be just and attending to his duties; and it did not occur to him in all the long debate that we had about it, which explored every branch of the affair in a greater or less degree, that there was any amendment that he wanted to propose.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Would any amendment have been in order if offered?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, Mr. President, it would not have been in order; but it would have been in order for the honorable Senator from Iowa to have got up and stated, as the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] did, that if the bill should come to the point of being taken up in detail he had an amendment to offer; and it was entirely competent, therefore, for the Senator from Iowa, if there was anything that had occurred to his mind in the way of an amendment that he wished for, to say so as a reason why the bill should not be indefinitely postponed; but it did not occur to him. It does not appear that there was any amendment that he wanted to the bill. He apparently wanted to vote for it as it stood. Nothing in his remarks, nothing in anything that he has proposed would lead anybody to a different conclusion. There is, therefore I think, not a good ground of justice in the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, that the friends of the bill have been cut off from proposing amendments by the motion that I had the honor to submit, because the Senator is too familiar with the course of parliamentary proceeding not to know that any Senator who wishes to perfect the bill has only to give notice of his intention and to point out how he thinks the bill can be made acceptable to the majority of the Senate, or to him, at any time in the course of the debate, and that would be a reason, if a good suggestion were made, why it should not be indefinitely postponed.

The Senator has referred to amendments to be made to meet my views. I hoped that I had been able to make the Senate understand, and not to be misunderstood by my honorable friend, that there was no amendment that could be made to this bill, in respect of recognizing any one of these claims, which would meet my views after the investigation, such as it was, that I had been able to make of it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Allow me. If I said "to meet the Senator's views," I certainly did not state my meaning.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that was the language.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Then I was unfortunate in the use of words. I should have said "to meet the Senator's objections."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is quite another thing. That disposes of that part of the affair.

But I do not want to detain the Senate in going over this matter again. There can be no denial of the fact that everything that the friends of this bill could urge in its favor has been said, that two days ago they were unwilling to have the matter go over for a single day but were desirous of bringing it to a final disposition then.

Now one word more and I have done, and I hope forever with this subject. Some Senator has said—I do not know but the Senator from Iowa—that it was a very unusual thing for a Senator who had opposed a measure and who had voted with the majority in disposing of it, to move to reconsider. I think the Senator is mistaken about that. I did not make the motion to reconsider until the promoter of the bill, the Senator who had reported it and who had been urging its passage, and who was in the minority as he found, had given notice that he would enter a motion to reconsider, having voted against his convictions on the record in order to have the opportunity to do that thing. In that state of the case, as well as in any other for that matter, clearly any Senator had a right, not only under the rules but upon any principle of courtesy, to make the motion himself and have the matter disposed of. The idea of a reconsideration is not that the minority shall ask the reconsideration and shall hang the matter up to see if they cannot muster forces enough, as the expression of somebody was, to try it again; but the theory of a reconsideration is that some member in the majority, who is really in the majority and not merely in form on the record, discovers that there is some matter of doubt or misunderstanding or new information that he has obtained which leads him to desire to consider the measure again with a view to seeing whether he has not made a mistake. That is the theory of the rule as to the motion to reconsider.

That is all I wish to say.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, as the Senator from Vermont did not seem to understand very fully what I said on the occasion of the few remarks I made on this bill, I have a right to presume, I think, that somebody else misunderstood it; and therefore I will endeavor to explain what the idea was that I thought I had fairly expressed at the time about the adjustment of the differences between the States in reference to what they believed their rights were at the hands of the General Government, which preceded and accompanied the report of this bill. That did not take the shape of any formal conference or caucus or anything of that sort, but it was a talk in the committee in reference to the various classes of claims which the States were pressing on the attention of the committee, and which to some extent they desired to have embodied in this bill.

I said, somewhat briefly, that the nature of these claims was various; that is, that there were certain classes of them. As the Senator from Colorado has said, Colorado is estopped by the act of her admission to claim a percentage on the homestead entries. The people of Colorado might therefore very fairly have said, "As we are not to get this, Kansas should not have it." The people of Ohio, where they did not have any homestead entries within the limits of that State on which they could make any charge against the General Government, might fairly say that they preferred not to commit themselves to a claim of greater magnitude on behalf of the State of Kansas. There were a great many classes of claims against the General Government growing out of the several acts of admission. Through them all, however, there was one particular class which was common to all of them substantially, and that was this claim for 5 per cent. on entries made with military land warrants.

In the case of the State of Ohio the precise extent of that was to some extent qualified by the fact that that fund was to be divided in a certain way. The committee thought on the whole that the Government had waived the right to divide the fund in that manner, that it had substantially recognized the right of the State to have it all, and that having waited all these many years without expending that money, now it ought to go to the State at all events, saying nothing about the legislative recognition of the principle embodied in the bill made at different times.

All these claims resting upon the theories of the several States would have amounted to many millions of dollars, fifteen or twenty perhaps. We knew that in accordance with the ordinary course of things the time would come when these claims would not only be presented in all that magnitude, if something was not now done, when they would have greater chance of passing perhaps than they have now; and for the purpose of having a final settlement of all these matters it was agreed that that class of claims which was common to all the States should be taken up and presented as they were embodied substantially in this bill, and the rest of them should be cut off so that hereafter they should never be brought to the attention of Congress; that is, the States would never put themselves in the attitude of claiming anything from Congress on account of the entries not embraced in this bill.

I do not think there was anything unfair in that, and I was a little surprised to hear a suggestion or a hint that there had been any log-rolling. I certainly am not aware that any Senator on this floor who is interested in the passage of this bill ever mentioned the subject directly or indirectly to any other Senator with the view of influencing his vote. I certainly did not, and nothing was further from the intention of the committee or from that of the promoters of the bill originally than that there should be any kind of log-rolling or a resort to any practice whatever to put this bill on any other than its proper footing as a just and, as we believe, a legal claim against the Government; not perhaps legal in the sense that it could be enforced in a court of law, but standing on the ground of a valid consideration which the Government ought to be as prompt to respond to as an individual under similar circumstances.

Much has been said about what these States have had, and about the unconscionable nature of this claim for the reason that they have been beneficiaries of the public-land system of the United States; and it has been spoken of as a grab, or as this fund being one that was going into a common pot to be divided, and all that sort of thing. I called attention the other day to the fact that this was not a divide in the sense in which the public funds have heretofore been divided by men in control of the United States Government. I have observed to-day that that same principle of "a fair divide" obtains and is to be pressed on the Senate in other matters. The Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY,] from his seat to-day, asked the Senate to make a special order of a bill, which is to do what? To take 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the public lands for any purpose? By no means. With a modesty which characterizes him as an individual and the State he represents, he proposes to take the entire proceeds, all of them; and after he had made his motion, "the grave and reverend" Senator from Vermont, the senior Senator who voted so strongly against this bill, rose in his place and said that that bill was one of the utmost importance, and one that ought to be made a special order, and of course there would be no objection to it!

So it seems that the States which claim that they are entitled, legally, justly, fairly, honorably, to 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, are not to have it because it would interfere with the scheme to take all of them. The secret probably, to some extent, of the opposition manifested to this bill is that there is behind it a chance, or a scheme, or a design to appropriate the entire public lands of the United States, all of the proceeds hereafter to be derived, for purposes which are to some extent personal, so to speak, to the several States of the Union, not for a common purpose, not for a purpose simply that is common to all the people of the United States, because that purpose is no more common to the people of the United States than the purpose for which the grant to be derived from the passage of this bill, if it should pass, is to be devoted.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator state for what purpose the money is to be appropriated by that bill?

Mr. PLUMB. I understand that it is to be appropriated for purposes of education.

Mr. BAILEY. Among the people of all the States, all the children of the States.

Mr. PLUMB. That question after all is no more a question of general importance, practically speaking, in that view of it than that which is presented in the bill now under consideration, because it so happens that a majority of the States interested in this bill have sacredly devoted the fund to be derived from the proceeds of the sale of these lands, either by State constitution or by legislative enactment, to the cause of education in the several States. That is a purpose which is general, because it is a purpose that inhered in the original grant by Virginia to the General Government of these lands so far as they cover the States in the Northwestern Territory. The State of Virginia in the act of cession specially enjoined upon the General Government that education should be promoted. In pursuance of that stipulation, ever since 1841 the General Government has given two sections out of every township of public lands for educational purposes, and why? Because it was to promote that general object which inhered in and was a part of the cession of the Northwestern Territory and because that was a common purpose so far as the people of the United States are concerned. You may make a larger or a smaller territorial distribution, but the question of the purpose is just the same.

We ask, as I said, only 5 per cent., but we are to be postponed in order that not only 95 per cent. but 100 per cent. of the public lands, the whole remainder, may be taken away. The Senator from Vermont says that it has been complained of that he made this motion. I do not complain of it. I saw from the beginning that the Senator from Vermont had set his heart upon defeating this bill; and knowing his resources, knowing his determination, knowing his skill in debate, in parliamentary practice, and in everything of that kind, I expected that if there was a motion which more than any other motion would emphasize that determination, which would carry out the idea with which he started, he would make it. To that extent of course he was entirely justified. He was justified upon all grounds. I certainly did not hear the motion made with any kind of surprise whatever, and I do not complain of it. It is simply a question as to whether now the Senate will adopt the motion thus made and thereby dispose of the whole matter so far as it is presented in its present form.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I desire to say only a word upon this question.

The Senator from Indiana this morning moved to postpone the bill until the first Monday in April, stating as a reason for such postponement that he wished to argue further the questions involved in the bill, and that he desired more time to furnish specific information to the Senate. I think the request made by the Senator from Indiana was reasonable, because I do know that when he comes to furnish that information to the Senate it will show that so far from this bill involving, in any construction of it, $10,000,000, it cannot involve half that sum. Yet the other day we were told that the eventualities of the bill would involve $10,000,000. So in regard to other questions that are involved here, a little light upon them will undoubtedly show that many of the reasons which governed gentlemen in voting against the bill may in the end induce them in some form to support it.

When I submitted a few remarks the other day upon the bill, I stated distinctly that I expected to vote for amendments to it, as I did expect and do expect to vote for amendments to it if the bill is to pass—not in the way of enlarging it, (possibly I may also vote for some amendments to enlarge it,) but in the way of restricting its provisions, because I think there ought to be further restrictive provisions, and I so stated. Immediately upon the motion being made to which I refer, the Senator from Vermont moved to indefinitely postpone the whole question, so that there shall be here and now, without further discussion, without further opportunity of debate, without further consideration, an absolutely clinching vote upon the bill, in order that it may be killed at the present time.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BAILEY] proposed this morning, and secured the unanimous consent of the Senate, that on the 8th day of March we shall take up the question of the distribution of all the public lands in the United States, amounting to many millions of acres, for the promotion of education. I have not examined in detail the provisions of that bill; but I want to say here and now to him, that if he presents a fair bill looking to the devotion of the public lands to the illiterate people of this country, I shall give it my hearty and cordial support. When that bill comes here in March and shall have been debated, as it will be debated, it may very materially modify the views of gentlemen in regard to the claim of certain States of the Union for 5 per cent. upon the proceeds of the public lands. Yet we are to be cut off here without any discussion, without any opportunity for discussion, in view of the new lights that have been bestowed this morning upon the question.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] rose in his place and asked my colleague a question. I thought he was asking the question of me, and therefore took the liberty of replying to him; but I was informed that he was seeking information from my colleague and not from me. He asked why we should not refer this question to the Court of Claims inasmuch as there are divisions here in reference to the construction of these statutes. True, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] says that that is not all that is involved; but that suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts is worthy of considering. I have faith in the Court of Claims, and of course in the Supreme Court, who would have jurisdiction of this question as an appellate court; and it is worthy of consideration whether we should not submit this whole question, under limitations and restrictions, to the Court of Claims.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not wish to be heard again upon this matter and if the Senator will allow me to ask him a question, let me ask him, does he understand that disposing of this bill finally would prevent the introduction of a bill to send any question that the State of Iowa or any other State has, to the Court of Claims, if any bill be necessary, as it is not?

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Vermont knows perfectly well that I know as well as he knows that if the bill is killed this day, as he proposes to kill it, I can reintroduce this identical bill to-morrow and force it upon the consideration of a committee, as of course any Senator can introduce a bill submitting the whole question to the Court of Claims.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my honorable friend will pardon me, I do not say I know anything, but I think I know that under the rules of the Senate, that have been tried out and decided in the time of Thomas H. Benton, who was supposed to know something of what he was about, nothing of the kind that the Senator speaks of, in regard to reintroducing this bill, can be done.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. At this session of Congress?

Mr. EDMUNDS. At this session of Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not understand the rules as the Senator from Vermont understands them. Of course I could not introduce the exact bill proposed here, but the substance of this bill could be forced upon the attention of the Senate year after year; and I want to give notice to the Senator from Vermont that if we are to be cut off in this way by the votes of a majority of the Senate on a motion now to indefinitely postpone, he will sit here, I hope many years, to hear a rediscussion of this question, as he would be bound to do.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. ALLISON. What I ask the Senator from Vermont to submit to I believe is only a fair request. It is a request that if the Senator from Vermont himself were to make would be accorded almost by unanimous consent in this body.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not a bit of it.

Mr. ALLISON. Coming as it does from certainly a fair representation of gentlemen representing States of this Union believing that they have interests here that ought to be subserved, I think it is nothing more than a fair proposition that we should ask that the vote shall be so taken as that the bill can be, on the second Monday of December next, again considered in this body in the light of facts that may then exist.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator says if I were to make such a request he believes it would be unanimously consented. I wish to inquire of him, if I had asked the postponement now proposed at five o'clock in the afternoon of the day when the vote to indefinitely postpone the bill was taken, would he have voted himself to have the bill postponed until the second Monday in December, or for one week?

Mr. ALLISON. It is impossible for me to say now what I should have done on that evening. I can only say that on that evening, pressed as I was to have the vote taken on the Senator's motion to indefinitely postpone, I did vote against an adjournment at that hour. I did not feel that I was voting in a discourteous way to the Senator from Vermont, because for three successive days at the close of the morning hour he had the floor and yielded it to other gentlemen, who discussed and debated this question until three or four o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is mistaken about that; I did not have the floor. The Senator is entirely mistaken. I do not complain of any discourtesy in the Senate refusing to postpone the matter even for one day. It had a perfect right to do so, and it was no discourtesy to me. The friends of the bill thought they wanted it decided and they got it decided.

Mr. ALLISON. We desired a vote on the question of indefinite postponement. As the Senator says, that vote was taken and it proved to be an adverse vote to the friends of the measure. I am not complaining of that. I do not complain of anything in connection with this bill. I do not complain of the opposition made by the Senator from Vermont to the bill; it has been able, it has been thorough, it has been exhaustive; but opportunity ought to be given for a specific reply to the argument that he made at five o'clock in the afternoon day before yesterday, when he said that $10,000,000 would be taken out of the Treasury if the bill were to pass, when by any calculation, so far as I have been able to judge, it would be impossible to take $4,000,000 out of the Treasury under it. Yet upon that argument being made a vote was immediately taken.

Now, all I ask is that we shall postpone this question until the second Monday in December next, in the short session, and then reconsider the question. If we are then voted down, if a majority, as there appears now to be a majority, should be still opposed to the bill, then of course the question will be decided adversely by the Senate.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, I have but a very few words to say. I have already suggested one reason why I desire to have the bill still retained before the Senate, that it may hereafter consider it, which is, that I do not think there has been a fair discussion of the question in this body.

I now wish to call the attention of the Senate to a statement that has been made with reference to the amount of money which it has been claimed from time to time is involved in the bill. The Senate certainly understands that the bill simply embraces lands taken with military scrip and with land warrants, and nothing else. Inasmuch as lands entered by scrip, as it is termed, have heretofore been accounted to the States as cash entries, the scrip provision in the bill is simply surplusage, and has nothing to operate upon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is mistaken about that, I think, with great deference to him. I wish him to have the closing speech, and so he will pardon my interrupting him now. I will say that the bill is retrospective as well as prospective, from the dates of admission of the States. Consequently all the military scrip that was located or paid in before the admission of the States is embraced in the bill, although the States since have got their pay on the military scrip.

Mr. McDONALD. I do not understand the bill to be retrospective in the sense that the Senator has stated; but if there was any question on that point it had been my purpose to move at the proper time an amendment by which all ambiguity upon the subject would be removed, limiting it to such entries as had been made since the several States had been admitted into the Union under their respective enabling acts.

In the first assault that the Senator from Vermont made upon the bill he spoke of the quantity involved, and undoubtedly he supposed that the amount would have some impression on the mind of some one who might be called upon to vote in regard to this matter. I read now from the RECORD of the 12th of February the statements then made by the Senator from Vermont upon that question, to be found on page 9 of the RECORD of that date:

Next we come to the bounty lands which of course are not granted to the States, and I only put them in so that this statement of sums may all go together. Under the acts of 1847, 1850, 1852, and 1855, down to the 30th of June, 1873, the issues and locations of bounty land warrants had been: land warrants for 69,986,070 acres of land had been issued, and there had been located 55,357,090 acres of land. This near sixty-one million acres at a dollar and a quarter an acre would make about $75,000,000, and 5 per cent. of that, as anybody can see, is in round numbers about $4,000,000.

Mr. McDONALD. I can give the Senator the exact figures of the land-warrant entries according to a statement furnished by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will pardon me, I have the exact statement myself, furnished by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. McDONALD. Perhaps this is more correct information.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator can put it in his speech. I take the Commissioner's printed report for 1873.

Mr. McDONALD. This statement covers that year.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If they differ, I do not know which we shall follow. I am quoting the printed report for 1873, found in the document I have named, at the page I have stated, and that number of acres, at $1.25 an acre would produce, at 5 per cent., which is the operation of this bill, to be exact about it, the sum of $3,811,629.30.

So that when the Senator came to quote the correct amount from the figures that he had before him he dropped down from the $4,000,000, stated in round numbers, to $3,811,629.30. When the Senator came, in the conclusion of this discussion, to the final consideration of the bill, as he will find by recurring to his remarks in the RECORD of February 26, he very much enlarged this sum. The beginning of the Senator's remarks then upon the subject are as follows:

I shall be very sorry, as there are only ten millions just now to be paid out of the Treasury, to go on in the absence of a quorum, and, therefore, to find out whether there is a quorum here, I move that the Senate do now adjourn, and on that I ask for a division, &c.

The Senate did not adjourn, and the Senator proceeded with his remarks. When he came to a discussion of this branch of the subject again, here are his statements, to be found on the next page:

The honorable Senator from Kansas says these surrenders of right made a consideration which entitles these States now to tax the people of the United States to pay into their treasuries these moneys, amounting as I say upon the bill as it stands, when you get it all together and as it will turn out, to hard upon $10,000,000. To say nothing about scrip, the 5 per cent. on the mere bounty lands alone since 1847 down to last year amounts to almost $5,000,000; and this bill contains scrip as well as it contains bounty lands—

Mr. McDONALD rose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator will pardon me. If I am going on to-night, I must go on myself. He will excuse me if I decline to be interrupted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont declines to be interrupted.

Mr. McDONALD. Not even to correct a statement?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not even to correct a statement. The Senator can correct me afterward.

The Senator from Vermont in this last attack of his upon the bill raises the amount upon bounty-land entries over his own exact statement in the beginning when his attention was called to it by me, almost $2,000,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is, from $3,811,000.

Mr. McDONALD. To $5,000,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To "hard upon $5,000,000," as a matter of my opinion.

Mr. McDONALD. No, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If you get this bill through, I think it will turn out that I am right.

Mr. McDONALD. As to the land-warrant entries which the Senator from Vermont read from the report, the entire amount of land warrants issued would not have made this sum up to $4,000,000, that he said it was hard upon in the beginning, so that there was simply a rise of a full million for which there was nothing whatever to base the statement upon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator forgets to read what I stated and what he probably has forgotten, that if he will look into the land report he will see that there is one State at least which was admitted since 1847, the State of Oregon I think it is, and that it may turn out, and probably will, that a considerable amount of these locations can be found there. Therefore I expressed my opinion that it would come hard to $5,000,000, I expressed it sincerely, and I repeat it now.

Mr. McDONALD. Oh, but the Senator showed in the first statement that the whole number of land warrants issued was only about sixty million acres.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, but I stated at the same time that in the report from which I read the State of Oregon did not appear at all, and I believe it would appear that there were bounty lands located there.

Mr. McDONALD. But the Senator was not going to the fountain-head; he was giving us the statement of the number of land warrants issued and the quantity of acres thus covered by them.

Mr. President, I trust that the motion to indefinitely postpone will be voted down, and that we shall at least retain the bill in the control of the Senate until it can be further considered and examined.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FERRY in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. If no friend of the bill wishes to make any further remark, I will, pending this question, move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. I do not do it for the purpose of cutting off any debate, if anybody wants to speak. If anybody wishes to say anything more, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. McDONALD. That is all right. Let us take the vote on that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EATON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FERRY, (when his name was called.) On this motion I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] Were he present he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] If he were present I presume that he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] upon the bill. That Senator is absent, and I do not know what position he would take upon the question now pending before the Senate. If his colleague [Mr. BAILEY] will advise me in regard to the matter, I shall be governed by his suggestions, if he knows the wishes of his colleague.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not feel authorized to advise the Senator as to how he should vote. My colleague, as I am, is opposed to the passage of the bill. Although I am opposed to the passage of the bill, I am very willing to vote for the motion made by the Senator from Indiana to postpone its consideration until the second Monday in December, and hence I have voted against the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. I am utterly unable to advise the Senator from Minnesota. He must decide the question for himself.

Mr. McMILLAN. In view of the uncertainty that exists I shall withhold my vote. If the Senator from Tennessee were here I should vote "nay."

Mr. WITHERS, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this bill with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] I do not know how he would vote on the pending motion.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. FARLEY. On this bill I paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. SHARON] the other evening. As he is absent, having gone to New York, I shall continue the pair. If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea" on this motion.

Mr. SLATER. I desire to announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. GROVER] with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] My colleague would vote "nay" if he were present.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL] who sits next to me is paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD.] If the Senator from Colorado were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My colleague [Mr. HEREFORD] is paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.] Were my colleague present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. TELLER. My colleague [Mr. HILL] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD.] If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—19.
Anthony,	Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Morrill,
Bayard,	Dawes,	Hoar,	Platt,
Beck,	Edmunds,	Kernan,	Rollins,
Booth,	Groome,	McPherson,	Saulsbury.
Burnside,	Hamlin,	Maxey,

Conkling,	Harris,	McMillan,	Whyte,
Eaton,	Hereford,	Randolph,	Withers.

So the motion to lay on the table was rejected.

Mr. McDONALD. I now move that the further consideration of the whole subject be postponed until the second Monday in December next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How does the question come to be on that motion when I have a motion pending to postpone indefinitely?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator to withdraw that motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator did not withdraw it, and the Senator did not say that he withdrew it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In that case, as the motion of the Senator from Vermont has priority, the question is on the motion to indefinitely postpone.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. SHARON.]

Mr. FERRY, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.] If he were here, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. WITHERS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Anthony,	Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Morrill,
Bayard,	Dawes,	Hoar,	Platt,
Beck,	Edmunds,	Kernan,	Rollins,
Booth,	Groome,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,

Carpenter,	Grover,	Jones of Nevada,	Whyte,
Conkling,	Harris,	McMillan,	Withers.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. McDONALD,] that the Senate postpone the further consideration of the motion to reconsider the indefinite postponement of the bill until the second Monday in December next.

The motion was agreed to.

MUSCLE SHOALS APPROPRIATION.

Mr. GORDON. I present a letter from the Secretary of War, with accompanying papers, and ask that they be printed. They relate to a subject of considerable importance. The Secretary of War himself requests that his letter, with the accompanying papers, be printed for the information of the Senate and of the public.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. What is the subject to which they relate?

Mr. GORDON. They are in reference to the use by the Secretary of War of a portion of the sum appropriated under the river and harbor act to the Muscle Shoals, for the purpose of paying a contractor who had a claim against the Government. It was a diversion of a portion of the appropriation from the purpose for which it was intended to the payment of the heirs of a former contractor. The question having been raised by the Committee on Commerce, in justice to the Secretary of War and also in justice to the committee itself, and with the consent of the committee, I ask that these papers be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to know, before I give my consent, what papers accompany the letter of the Secretary of War?

Mr. GORDON. They embrace the correspondence between the committee and the Secretary of War, to begin with, and then the estimates by the engineers of the amount due this contractor, and the opinions of the legal officer of the War Department as to the right of the Secretary to take from the appropriation the sum and pay it to the contractor.

Mr. McMILLAN. The opinion of the law officer of the War Department sustains the payment by the Secretary of War out of the appropriation made to satisfy the claim of Williams.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Georgia to ask simply that the papers be printed, not that they be referred.

Mr. GORDON. I only ask that they be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the order to print will be made.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WITHERS, it was Ordered, That Mary E. Parker, administratrix of L. C. P. Cowper, be permitted to withdraw from the Senate files the papers in the claim of L. C. P. Cowper.

On motion of Mr. LAMAR, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Adeline Shirley be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. BURNSIDE, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Under the understanding had regarding the bill (S. No. 1139) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, late major-general of the United States volunteers and colonel of the Army, I now call up that bill and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read.

Mr. LOGAN. I am satisfied that the Senator from New Jersey would not desire to proceed at this late hour, and I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I should like to have the bill read.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; I withdraw my motion.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I simply ask to have the bill read, and then I will give way for a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business, as suggested by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to address the Senate upon the Geneva award question. I think I shall not occupy more than thirty minutes, certainly not over forty. I understand from the honorable Senator from New Jersey that it would be convenient to him when this bill is taken up next week to lay it aside informally long enough for that purpose. I merely wish to make the statement now.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I understand that under the rules of the Senate this bill will be the unfinished business of the Senate on Monday after the morning hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I will state now that if the Senator from Massachusetts wishes, immediately upon the completion of the morning hour on Monday, to occupy such time as he may desire without detriment to the pending bill, I have no objection. I shall follow him immediately, of course, upon the bill that is now before the Senate and which will be the unfinished business for Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the understanding that the Senator from Massachusetts shall address the Senate on Monday?

Mr. HOAR. I do not suppose it requires any assent of the Senate; I merely gave the notice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has asked if there is objection, and the Chair hears none.

Mr. BAYARD. That understanding being had between the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from New Jersey, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and (at five o'clock and four minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 27, 1880.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

Mr. CABELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Railways and Canals, submitted a report in writing upon the bill (H. R. No. 4507) to abolish all tolls charged by the Louisville and Portland Canal; which report was ordered to be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Railways and Canals, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. SAPP presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa in relation to interstate commerce; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution is as follows:

Joint resolution in relation to interstate commerce.

Resolved by the General Assembly of Iowa, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to use all their influence to secure the enactment by Congress of a law that will inaugurate a system of controlling railroad corporations so as to prevent abuses in management, unjust discriminations, and excessive charges for transportation on all interstate lines of railroads.

2. Resolved, That the secretary of state be instructed to furnish a copy of this resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

LORE ALFORD,
Speaker of the House.
FRANK T. CAMPBELL,
President of the Senate.

Approved February 16, 1880.

JNO. H. GEAR.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the original joint resolution. Witness my hand and the great seal of the State this 23d day of February, A. D. 1880.

JAS. HULL,
Secretary of State of Iowa.

DES MOINES RIVER LANDS.

Mr. DEERING, by unanimous consent, presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa relating to the Des Moines River lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD. It is as follows:

Memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa relating to the Des Moines River lands.

Whereas by an act of Congress of August 8, 1846, a grant of land was made to the then Territory of Iowa to aid in the improvement of the navigation of the Des Moines River from its mouth to the Racoon Fork; and

Whereas on the 9th day of June, 1854, the State of Iowa contracted with a corporation known as the Des Moines Navigation and Railroad Company to complete the work then begun by the State as provided by said grant, and to be done for the lands granted thereby without liability of the State; and

Whereas the State, in 1858, for the purpose of a settlement with said corporation, made a deed to the said company of what title the State then had to certain lands therein described north of the Racoon Fork; and

Whereas by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States at the December term, 1859, between the Dubuque and Sioux City Railroad Company and Edwin C. Litchfield, it was decided that said grant did not extend above the Racoon Fork and that the certificates issued by the Land Department to the State for said lands were void and that the said company had no title whatever to the lands claimed by them above said Racoon Fork; and

Whereas by the joint resolution of Congress of March 2, 1861, all the remaining interest in said lands above said Racoon Fork so erroneously certified was released to the bona fide holders of the patents of the State, and by the act of Congress of July 12, 1862, said grant of 1846 was extended so as to include the odd-numbered sections lying within five miles of said river, between the Racoon Fork and the north line of the State of Iowa; and

Whereas numerous settlers entered upon the said lands lying north of the Racoon Fork at various times, some of them as early as 1854, believing them to be Government lands open to settlement under the pre-emption and homestead laws of the United States, and have made valuable improvements thereon with a view to ultimate perfection of their title, many of whom have long held possession from the United States under said laws; and

Whereas the Secretary of the Interior, Hon. O. H. Browning, on the 9th day of May, 1868, in an opinion carefully reviewing the acts of 1846, 1861, and 1862, and what is known as the Harvey settlement of 1866 under them, also the contradictory opinions of the various officials upon the original grant of 1846 and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and particularly that known as the Wolcott case, decided that the said lands heretofore improperly certified north of the Racoon Fork were open to pre-emption and settlement under the laws of the United States; and

Whereas, in pursuance of such opinion and decisions and encouraged thereto by such authority and the advice of eminent counsel, several hundreds of said settlers proceeded to file their declarations and undertook in good faith to perfect their titles to the lands selected and improved by them as mentioned, and many of said settlers had prior to that time so filed their declarations, and applied to pre-empt said land and make homestead entries thereon; and

Whereas grievous litigation is now pending in the various courts of the State and of the United States relating to the title to said lands, improvements thereon, &c.; and

Whereas, on account of the very great hardship that has been brought about by the conflicting decisions aforesaid, great disturbance and trouble has already arisen and is likely to arise unless some satisfactory and just action be taken by the State and General Government relating to this subject; and

Whereas the settlers aforesaid are wholly without remedy under the effect of said rulings of the various Departments and officers of the General Government and courts and they only desire that the United States should take proper action to protect them, and it has become a matter of vital importance to all the settlers on these lands, whether holding under the United States laws as pre-emptors or under the company, as well as to all other people residing along the Des Moines Valley from the Racoon Fork to the north line of ninety-two on the east side, and the north line of eighty-eight on the west side of the river, to which point said lands were certified, that these long-continued and vexing controversies connected with the legislation referred to be fully and finally settled; and

Whereas the settlers upon said lands believe that no action has ever been taken relating to these lands in which the United States and the interest of the United States have been fairly and properly represented in court, and only desire that this may be done: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives of the State of Iowa, (the senate concurring,) That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives requested to favor the immediate passage of a bill which shall in some manner provide for the Attorney-General of the United States to immediately commence proceedings or cause such proceedings to be instituted by suit, either in law or in equity, or both, as may be necessary, and appear in the name of the United States so as to remove all clouds from the title to said lands, in which suits any person or persons in possession of or claiming title to any tract or tracts of land under the United States involved in such suits may, at his or their expense, unite with the United States in the prosecution of such suits, to the end that the title or titles of any person or persons claiming said lands may be forever settled.

LORE ALFORD,
Speaker of the House.
FRANK T. CAMPBELL,
President of the Senate.

Approved February 16, 1880.

JNO. H. GEAR.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the original resolution. Witness my hand and the great seal of the State this 24th day of February, A. D. 1880.

[SEAL.]

JAS. HULL,
Secretary of State of Iowa.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] asks consent that Judge Twigg, of Georgia, be admitted to the floor during his stay in the city. The gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] asks the same privilege during to-day for Mr. David Perkins, of California.

There being no objection, the requests were granted.

LEMUEL ADAMS.

Mr. PRESCOTT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4752) granting a pension to Lemuel Adams, private of the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

BYRON ROSECRANS.

Mr. BREWER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4753) to correct the military record of Byron Rosecrans, late of Company H, Twenty-ninth Michigan Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION, ARKANSAS.

Mr. DUNN. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands to offer for consideration and adoption at this time a resolution proposing an investigation of matters pertaining to the Hot Springs reservation, in the State of Arkansas.

The SPEAKER. This resolution was offered the other day and objected to; but as the Chair understands the objection is now withdrawn. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands, or any sub-committee appointed by the chairman thereof, be, and hereby is, instructed and directed to inquire into the manner in which the receiver appointed by the court under the provisions of section 5 of an act approved June 11, 1870, in relation to the Hot Springs reservation, in the State of Arkansas, performed the duties of said receivership, the amount and kind of property he took possession of in the name of the Government, what disposition was made thereof, what sum or sums of money he received for the rent or other use of said property, and generally to inquire fully into his conduct in that behalf, and also to investigate the manner in which the Hot Springs commission, appointed under the provisions of the acts of March 3, 1877, and December 16, 1878, in relation to the Hot Springs reservation in the State of Arkansas, have performed their duties; and to investigate fully all matters of alleged maladministration of said acts by said commissioners, or either of them, or by any officer or employee of said commission, either in the matter of making or rescinding orders of condemnation or making awards of the right of purchase under improper influences or speculating in contested claims or issuing certificates for condemned houses that have not been injured, removed, or taken by the Government; and to inquire into and ascertain what portion of the certificates issued by said commission for condemned buildings and property is just and right and what portion thereof is unjust, and into the receipts and expenditures of money on any and all accounts, and the amount of compensation received by said commissioners and each of their officers and employees, and into the settlement and condition of the account of any disbursing agent or officer said commission may have had; and generally to inquire fully into all of said matters and whether in any case wrong or injustice has been done to the Government or to individuals, and into the present condition, amount, kind, and value of property now held by the Government on the said Hot Springs reservation, and report by bill or otherwise such recommendations as they may deem wise and proper in the premises. And that said committee or any sub-committee thereof appointed as aforesaid shall have power to send for persons and papers, call and examine witnesses, administer oaths, sit during the sessions of the House, may have a clerk, stenographer, and messenger, and may proceed to said Hot Springs to prosecute said investigation, if deemed advisable by said committee, during the session of Congress; and the expenses of said investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House upon the certificate of the chairman of said investigating committee.

Mr. BROWNE. Is this resolution in order at the present time?

The SPEAKER. The resolution was presented the other day and objection was made by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] the Chair thinks. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] to present the resolution to-day on the ground that the gentleman who objected to it before does not any longer object. The resolution is not before the House except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BROWNE. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. If not so referred, I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The resolution comes from the Committee on Public Lands, being reported by unanimous consent of the committee, as the Chair understands.

Mr. DUNN. The Committee on Public Lands have directed me to report this resolution; and if I can get permission I will make a statement which will satisfy the House.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the resolution because we have had a commission whose action was supposed to be satisfactory, and, if so, whose decision should have been final. The House has determined that the Government shall not receive the money it might have received under the proceedings of that commission. Here is a proposition for additional expense for an investigation to go over the same ground again, without calling those commissioners before the committee. I object to this until the members of the commission already appointed have been heard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] both object.

OFFICIAL CONDUCT OF DISTRICT COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I am instructed, by unanimous vote of the Committee for the District of Columbia, to ask the adoption of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States, That the Committee for the District of Columbia are hereby directed to investigate the charges against the commissioners for the District made in a communication from the Treasurer of the United States, submitted to the House by the Secretary of the Treasury February 25, 1880; and for this purpose said committee are authorized to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths.

Mr. COX. I hope this resolution will be adopted.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

REPORT ON SHEEP HUSBANDRY.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Printing, reported back, with an amendment, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 68) to authorize the printing of 10,000 copies of the Report on Sheep Husbandry.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That 10,000 copies of the report of the Department of Agriculture on "Sheep Husbandry" be, and the same is hereby, ordered to be printed for distribution by the members of the House of Representatives among their constituents.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 3 strike out "10" and insert "13;" and in line 5, after the word "printed," insert "3,000 copies for the Senate, 10,000 copies thereof;" so as to make the resolution read as follows:

"That 13,000 copies of the report of the Department of Agriculture on 'Sheep Husbandry' be, and the same is hereby, ordered to be printed; 3,000 copies for the Senate, 10,000 copies thereof for distribution by the members of the House of Representatives among their constituents."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions of the Dubuque Reserve Corps, in favor of equalization of bounties; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT OF TARIFF LAWS.

Mr. DUNNELL. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee of Ways and Means, upon which it is very important action should be had at once. A report which accompanies the bill will explain the circumstances of the case. The bill which I propose to report is the bill H. R. No. 3462 to amend section 3020 of the Revised Statutes.

The SPEAKER. This is a public bill.

The bill, which was read, provides that section 3020 of the Revised Statutes be so amended as to read as follows:

SEC. 3020. Where fire-arms, scales, balances, shovels, spades, axes, hatchets, hammers, plows, cultivators, mowing-machines, and reapers, manufactured with stock or handles made of wood grown in the United States, are exported for benefit of drawback under the preceding section, such articles shall be entitled to such drawback in all cases where the imported material exceeds one-half of the value of the material used. And where cans, manufactured in whole or in part of imported material, filled with products grown or produced in the United States, are exported for benefit of such drawback, the same shall, in all cases, be entitled to the drawback provided for in the preceding section where the imported material used in the manufacture of such cans shall equal 70 per cent. of the value of all the material used in the manufacture thereof.

Mr. DUNNELL. There is a short report accompanying this bill, which I ask to be read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reception of the bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Where does this come from?

Mr. DUNNELL. From the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. DUNNELL. It is. It is a bill which was introduced by the gentleman from Oregon, [Mr. WHITEAKER,] and its passage is a matter of necessity at this season of the year. It affects the salmon fisheries of the Columbia River, and I hope there will be no objection to its passage. The report is short and I ask that it be read.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Let it be read, reserving, however, all points of order.

The report was read, as follows:

This bill is urged for passage by parties upon the Pacific coast who are engaged in preserving fish, meats, and fruits for exportation in tin cans. These parties have heretofore, and till the 15th of August, 1879, been allowed by the Treasury Department a drawback upon the tin plates used in the manufacture of tin cans equal to the duty paid less 10 per cent. upon a certificate of exportation, under section 3019 of the Revised Statutes.

On the 15th of August, 1879, the Treasury Department refused further to allow a drawback upon the tin cans exported in all cases where native lead was used in the preparation of the solder of the cans, the section of the Revised Statutes, namely, 3019, allowing a drawback only in cases where the exported article is manufactured from articles wholly of foreign growth or production.

It is estimated that one and a half million pounds of lead is used in the preparation of the solder of the cans manufactured upon the Pacific coast and filled with fish, meats, and fruits for exportation to foreign countries.

Native lead in large quantities is produced from the mines in Nevada and finds a market in the city of San Francisco. This lead can be purchased at a cost of from three and one-half to four cents per pound, while the foreign lead costs from six to seven cents per pound.

These parties, by purchasing foreign lead and using the same in the preparation of the solder for the cans, under now existing laws would be entitled to and would receive from the Government the amount of duties paid upon the articles exported, but to compel them to do so would require them to pay to foreign merchants in round numbers about $30,000 more for their product than what the native product can be purchased for. The revenue of the Government will not be affected, but one of the leading industries of the Pacific States stimulated and promoted.

One of the leading industries of the State of Oregon is the salmon fisheries of the Columbia River. It is estimated that ten and one-half million dollars of the product of these fisheries was preserved in tin cans during the past year and exported to England and Australia.

These parties ask that tin cans may be taken from the operations of section 3019 and placed in section 3020, which allows a drawback to be paid upon certain specified articles, and that they be thus allowed a drawback upon the tin plates used in the manufacture of tin cans, without reference to the lead used in the preparation of the solder.

The question is, shall these parties be compelled to purchase foreign lead at a bonus of about $30,000 to foreign producers; or shall they be permitted to use the native product?

In addition to the foregoing facts, which relate entirely to the Pacific States and Territories, the bill will favorably affect a much larger interest in the Atlantic States. In the manufacture of tin cans for the export of petroleum, the number of five-gallon cans manufactured in the city of New York in 1879 has been estimated to have been not less than ten millions, 90 per cent. of which were used for exporting oil.

To compel the use of foreign material for soldering of metal cans intended for export in order to secure the drawback under section 3019 is to discriminate against our own products and industries and gain nothing by such discrimination in the way of increased revenue.

The immediate passage of this bill is made necessary from the fact that the season of the year is now at hand when those engaged in the salmon fisheries of the Pacific coast lay in their supplies of material for the manufacture of their cans, and it is important that they may be able to purchase native solder instead of the foreign product.

Mr. DUNNELL. Just one single sentence in addition.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DUNNELL. I trust there will be no objection.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Does this come with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. DUNNELL. It does.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Is it the unanimous report of the Committee of Ways and Means?

Mr. DUNNELL. It is. As the law now is, there is a drawback on domestic products of 90 per cent. when shipped abroad, exported in tin cans. As the law now is, it is necessary that the American producer shall go abroad and get the lead out of which his solder is made in the manufacture of these tin cans. We have lead here at home, and we simply provide in this bill that lead may be used, our own domestic lead, in the production of solder, so the shippers abroad may not get the drawback. It will be seen at once nothing at all is lost to the Treasury by the passage of this bill; but, on the contrary, that we save at home $30,000 or $40,000 a year which we are now compelled to send abroad in the purchase of foreign lead, when we might as well use our own lead and get the drawback.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHITEAKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

On motion of Mr. McMILLIN, by unanimous consent, Dr. Hoyt, a member of the national educational convention, was admitted to the privileges of the floor.
